Mr. HICKENLOOPER. Mr. President, the Senator from South Dakota is rendering a service of incalculable value to the people of the United States under our system of justice, fair play, and sanitation in public office. I feel that what the Senator has just said in calling additional attention to the difficulties caused by "road block" thrown in the way of the proper investigation of the shortcomings of public officials is a matter of great importance. That such has been the custom and the habit of the administration for a considerable period of time in the past is very important, indeed.

I am glad the Senator has dwelt on this point at some length, and I emphasize, so far as my personal opinion is concerned, that the Senator has touched a most sensitive spot in the weakness which congressional committees find in attempting to ascertain the truth. To my own knowledge, the administration has, on repeated occasions, through aiding and abetting the concealment of records, the intimidation of witnesses, and the threatening with political extinction and loss of their jobs, or persons who would like to tell the facts as they saw them, prevented the full exposition of the truth to the American people about conditions, which, if they had knowledge of and realized their import, would produce a tremendous revolt in the country against the customs, practices, and administrative policies which have been steadily taking us down the road in shaping policies favorable to the Communist Party, which the Senator and I, and practically every other American, desire to resist.

I think the Senator has rendered an outstanding service in clarifying the matter. Regardless of what the Senator says today, only a minute portion of the truth of what has occurred in the past few years can probably be brought out.

Mr. MUNDT. I thank the Senator from Iowa for his kindly words and for his contribution to the subject. I know the Senator from Iowa speaks from the experience which he has had as an important member and former chairman of the Senate section of the Atomic Energy Committee.

It is a deplorable fact that a country which assumes that we have coordinated branches of government still has not found its Congress quite active, alert, and courageous enough to insist on its rights to certain facts and records from the executive agencies. Sometime we shall have to measure up to the dimensions of men, in my opinion, in our relationships with the executive agencies, to insist that we be given the facts we need in order to do our job constructively and well.

I call attention to the fact that this statement of White House obstruction was written after Alger Hiss had admitted under oath his relationship with Whittaker Chambers. We were simply trying to find out how the trail led from Hiss to some other source, and the White House denied us cooperation, but insisted on trying to reduce the investigation to comic-opera proportions by sneeringly referring to it as a "red herring." I hope the President saw, in the Washington Star a few days ago, how Mr. Jim Berryman placed the "red herring" in its proper proportions in that never-to-be-forgotten cartoon.

I now read further from the report of the committee:

RESPONSIBILITY OF THE ATTORNEY GENERAL

The committee again calls upon the Attorney General of the United States to vigorously enforce the existing espionage and other laws against those who are participating in the Communist conspiracy. These laws should be enforced without regard to partisan or political considerations because the very security of the Nation is at stake. The failure of the Attorney General to enforce the laws as vigorously as he should has been in a large part responsible for the growth and power of the Communist conspiracy in the United States.

The Attorney General has from time to time inferred that those who participated in the Bentley spy ring might be immune from prosecution under present laws because of the inadequacy of those laws. This investigation has shown clearly that a well-organized and dangerous espionage ring operated in the Government during the war; and if present laws are inadequate, as the Attorney General has inferred, to prosecute the members of this ring, it is the solemn responsibility of the Attorney General to forward to the Congress immediately his recommendations for needed changes in the espionage laws so that the national security can be protected.

It is also imperative that the Attorney General proceed promptly to call the New York special grand jury back into session to consider his recommendations on the disposition of the evidence he has placed before it. The public has the clear right to have this proceeding concluded by indictments where indicated, by a no-true bill where warranted, and by a full report by the Attorney General on his disposition of the case.

Mr. FERGUSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. MUNDT. I yield.

Mr. FERGUSON. Referring to the matter of the iron curtain in America, is it not true that this case was exposed by the Congress through a telephone call by a man from New York, and that it was necessary for the congressional committee to proceed without any aid whatever from the files of the Department of Justice, the State Department, or the White House? Is that not a fact?

Mr. MUNDT. That is correct. We had only a very small staff. The Senate and the House both have very small staffs as compared to those of any executive department.

Mr. FERGUSON. Is it not also a fact that, so far as the American people are concerned, and insofar as espionage in the United States is concerned, there has been an absolute iron curtain thrown around all information in the possession of the executive branch of the Government, which prevented the Congress from exposing to the people the various espionage cases?

Mr. MUNDT. There is no question about that. The Judiciary Committee, of which the Senator from Michigan is a very important member, has been trying for some time to give the American people the facts which they are entitled to have, to give the American public the names of Communists and Communist sympathizers who have been removed from the State Department because of disloyalty and who have been appointed to important positions in the United Nations. You cannot get these names. Our committee cannot get that information. It is not available. The President's freeze order denies those facts to the Members of the Congress.

Mr. KNOWLAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. MUNDT. I yield.

Mr. KNOWLAND. I believe that the Senator from South Dakota is making a valuable contribution to the American people by his address today. I fully agree with him that the Congress of the United States has the power to get this information if it will use intestinal fortitude to get it.

Mr. MUNDT. Exactly. We have the power if we have the courage.

Mr. KNOWLAND. That is correct. I am prepared, as a member of the Appropriations Committee, to join with other members from this side of the aisle and with members from the other side of the aisle, who I hope will join us, to serve notice on the State Department that we will withhold the appropriations for that Department until the information to which the Congress of the United States is entitled is received from them.

From time immemorial the legislative branches of government, the parliaments and legislative bodies of the Old World, as well as of the New World, have had control of the purse strings, and the reason why the people have given to their legislative representatives the control of the purse strings is to prevent the executive branch of the Government from becoming arbitrary in the use of its power. If we will exercise our congressional control of the purse strings and say, "We can wait this out just as long as you can wait it out, and unless we are furnished the information to which we are entitled, you do not get a single cent for the operation of your Department," I believe we can get the information to which we are entitled.

Mr. MUNDT. I know we can, and I think I can offer documentary proof from the archives of history. For a short period of time, the Eightieth Congress, the Republicans were in control of Congress. It happened at that time that I was a member of the Foreign Affairs Committee of the House, and Dean Acheson was before our committee trying to get us to accept the Truman doctrine, and the proposal for Greek-Turkish aid under the system worked out by the State Department. But because we had a majority in the committee we decided that we would not vote for Greek-Turkish aid, until Dean Acheson finally at long last published the secrets of the Yalta agreement. We told him so in public hearings. It is a matter of public record. He called at my office, telephoned me, begged me, and insisted that the matter be not pressed. We said, "You have concealed the facts long enough." Finally he called me up one night at 12 o'clock midnight and said, "The reports will be published in the Sunday morning papers tomorrow." They told us they had revealed all the secrets of the Yalta agreement. I am still a little curious to know whether they have all been disclosed. But finally the documents came, because we were talking a language the executive department understood. We were sitting on the purse strings until they gave us some facts. We can do that again. Congress can do that at any time.

Any time the Senate or the Congress of the United States wants some facts, all we have to do is to exercise the power we have in control of the purse strings, and we can make any recalcitrant executive produce the facts. If we do not, I think we might almost as well put the carpenters back in and a sign on the front door, "The place is vacant. The legislators have all moved out."

Mr. FERGUSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. MUNDT. I yield to the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. FERGUSON. Is it not true, then, that if the Congress wants information it can by the appropriate method, through control of appropriations at least, without using the contempt process which is usually suggested, obtain all the information desired?

Mr. MUNDT. That is correct.

Mr. FERGUSON. As to the information the Senator was trying to get from the office of the Secretary of State, as to persons in the State Department, or various other departments of the Government, whom Alger Hiss was responsible for sponsoring or hired. Does he know of anything in connection with those facts the disclosure of which would jeopardize the national security? Would the disclosure of the facts for which the Senator is asking in any way affect the national security?

Mr. MUNDT. Not in the slightest.

Mr. FERGUSON. Was the information refused on the ground that it would jeopardize the national security of the United States of America?

Mr. MUNDT. No. The only way in which the security of the United States was involved in the whole hearing was in connection with the releasing of the text of the documents in the "pumpkin papers." In that case we had perfect cooperation from the State Department, and they had perfect cooperation from us, and to this late date nine of the documents have never been disclosed. To have disclosed them would have served no useful purpose, and might have been a disservice. No other question was raised about the national security being involved.

Mr. FERGUSON. Does not the Senator feel it is very vital to the American people and to the Congress of the United States to ascertain the facts as to whom Mr. Hiss might have taken into the Department, what their functions were, and what they did at various international conferences? Does he not feel it would be important to know what such persons have done at international conferences?

Mr. MUNDT. I completely concur with the Senator, and I shall devote the greater portion of the remainder of my address to discussing that theme, and perhaps I should get back to it, because we have made a very careful and comprehensive study looking at the matter from the outside, as to the things Alger Hiss was in a position to do. We are not in a position at the moment to name all the people he brought into the State Department to carry out his purpose.

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. MUNDT. I shall once more, and then I wish to proceed.

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. There is in being at the moment an illustration which is very apt, and I merely wanted to call the Senator's attention to it in connection with the very things he has been discussing.

At the moment the Senator from California [Mr. KNOWLAND] has been zealous in seeking to ascertain from the State Department the names of certain people who prepared a document, who were actually the writers of the document. As I understand, the Senator from California was refused and ignored in his quest for that information, and at least one or two members of the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations have in committee meetings specifically asked for the information, and it has been denied and refused to the committee. What was sought was the identity of the individuals who were the writers or the preparers of a certain document, and to that extent again, under present circumstances, properly constituted committees of Congress are being refused merely factual information, not information which would reveal any national secrets.

Mr. MUNDT. The Senator is exactly correct.

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. I use that merely as an illustration.

Mr. MUNDT. In the remainder of my address I shall devote myself to suggesting some things which I think Senators should do if we propose actually to do something besides grumble and grouch about the development of a healthy foreign policy concerning which we have little to do besides sign the checks and authorize the payments.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield again?

Mr. MUNDT. I yield to the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. WHERRY. Is not this an illustration of the fact that the difficulty is we have a Government of men, not a Government of law? The secret agreement at Yalta, and what happened from then on, deny and bypass the very procedures the distinguished Senator is advocating.

I join in the sentiments expressed by a member of the Committee on Appropriations, that there is one way to handle this matter, namely, by withholding appropriations. But I submit to the distinguished Senator from South Dakota that that is certainly an unusual procedure to have to adopt, to see to it that the Government at home and abroad is operated under the constitutional processes established by the Constitution and all our statutes.

Mr. MUNDT. However, the Senator lives, as I do, in a section of the country, where, if we cannot attain a result by following the usual processes, we use an unusual one.

Mr. WHERRY. I am in favor of following any effective processes; but the Senator mentioned the Yalta agreement. He certainly knows that the Secretary of State, while he might have been familiar with all that occurred at Yalta, was at meetings at which was done the very thing he is discussing.

Mr. MUNDT. I intend to discuss that.

Mr. McCARTHY. Mr. President, will the Senator from South Dakota yield?

Mr. MUNDT. I yield to the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. McCARTHY. I wonder if the Senator is aware of a most fantastic statement the Secretary of State made in the last few minutes. At a press conference he was asked to comment on the conviction of Alger Hiss. I should like to have the Senator's comment on the Secretary's statement. This is what Dean Acheson said:

> Regardless of the outcome of the appeal, I shall never turn my back on Alger Hiss.

Mr. MUNDT. Of course, he speaks from the affinity of a close and long-established friendship, and a business relationship with his brother, with whom he was a partner in the law business. So I do not think he is exactly what we would call an objective witness as to the loyalty of Alger Hiss. Furthermore, I am not greatly concerned about what influence Alger Hiss has on the position of Dean Acheson's back but a great many Americans are concerned about the degree of influence Hiss may have had upon the position of Dean Acheson's mind.

Mr. CAPEHART. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. MUNDT. I yield to the Senator from Indiana.

Mr. CAPEHART. I am now more proud than ever of the fact that I voted against Acheson's confirmation.

Mr. McCARTHY. Will the Senator from South Dakota yield for one final question?

Mr. MUNDT. I yield.

Mr. McCARTHY. Would the Senator think the statement I have read might be an indication that the Secretary of State is also telling the world that he will not turn his back on any of the other Communists in the State Department, in other words, that this statement may go beyond Alger Hiss?

Mr. MUNDT. Before generalizing too much on a press statement made by the Secretary of State, I wish to continue with the body of the theme I hope to develop this afternoon.

I was quoting our committee report of August 27, and I now desire to call attention to one additional paragraph from the unanimous committee report, a short paragraph appearing on page 1356. I do this to put into the RECORD the incontrovertible fact that those who seek to denounce congressional committees, and more especially the House Committee on Un-American Activities—and that applies to President Truman and on down—and to laud the position of the administration on matters of protecting our security against disloyal agents, do so today with the full knowledge of the methods by which the executive agencies under the Truman administration are required to conceal and withhold records from Congress while availing themselves of whatever information congressional committees can supply to them. I call attention to the following paragraph therefore, Mr. President, in the hope that a way will be found so that information between our congressional committees and the executive agencies can become a two-way street to the mutual advantage of both and to the definite betterment of the position and security of our entire National Government set-up. Our committee report said:

> As evidence of this committee's sincerity in desiring to cooperate fully with the executive agencies in the ferreting out of all disloyal and un-American practices in Government during our committee's existence, we have opened our files to the security officers and loyalty board representatives of the executive departments. This year alone these representatives of the executive departments have paid over 14,000 official visits to our file rooms. They have been accorded full cooperation. Contrariwise, under the President's executive order, the files and records of the executive departments on all matters of loyalty and security have been firmly closed, not only to our committee but to all committees of Congress and to the general public. We hold that this is an unwholesome, and unwise, and an unsafe situation.

As a Representative looking longingly down the long corridor from the lower House to the upper House, as I approached service in this body, I hoped in those early days that when I got here I would be connected with a body which would have a firm determination to maintain its right and uphold its prestige and insist on such records. But I find that here, too, when the Executive slams the door, we have not yet found men who have developed a formula or a fortitude for prying the door open. So we still move in the darkness of legislating without facts insofar as loyalty is concerned, and, as I know after 10 years of experience on the Foreign Affairs Committee of the House, to a surprising degree so far as foreign policy is concerned.

We come next, Mr. President, to the damaging developments growing out of the fatal mistake that Alger Hiss made in trying to put a good front on a bad case through suing Whittaker Chambers for slander because of the fact that Chambers on the Meet the Press radio program had voluntarily offered to renew his charge that Hiss was a Communist at the time he was working in the State Department. At the pretrial examination occurring in the civil suit in Baltimore, it was disclosed for the first time that Whittaker Chambers had in his possession actual documentary evidence to support his testimony. In fact, this documentary evidence becoming available for the first time in December, went far beyond the original charge which Chambers had made before our House Committee on Un-American Activities. Some of the documents produced during the examination in Baltimore were in the handwriting of Alger Hiss and others were typed on the now famous Hiss Woodstock typewriter. All of the documents dealt with State Department information which Hiss had supplied to Chambers for the purpose of relaying to his Communist contacts in New York and Russia.

When the startling and significant nature of these documents were disclosed at the pretrial hearing in Baltimore, they were deemed of such consequence that they were delivered to the Department of Justice and there impounded. At this point, were it not for the quick-witted and courageous effort of Congressman NIXON, of California, who was a member of our subcommittee conducting the Hiss-Chambers hearings, it is possible that Hiss might yet have escaped the full consequences of his acts, because a United Press statement, which I propose to incorporate in the RECORD later, quoted the Department of Justice as saying that the Whittaker Chambers-Alger Hiss controversy was being dropped. The executive agencies were content once again to let things ride.

However, when the chief investigator of our committee, Robert E. Stripling, learned from a confidential source of what had taken place in Baltimore he conferred with Representative NIXON who happened to be in Washington during that portion of the congressional recess, and at NIXON'S suggestion a subpena duces tecum was promptly served on Whittaker Chambers to produce any and all other papers or documentary evidence involving Alger Hiss which might be in his possession. NIXON'S action on this matter proved to be a stroke of genius since Whittaker Chambers when served by this subpena took our investigators to the now celebrated pumpkin patch and there extracted the aluminum tubes of microfilm and documents which have played such an important part in getting the actual story before the public and in bringing Alger Hiss to justice.

As soon as these microfilms had been developed in a Government laboratory and their startling significance thus made apparent Congressman NIXON telephoned to me in South Dakota and I summoned a call for our special committee to convene in Washington as fast as we could reach the National Capital by air. Hearings were resumed on Tuesday, December 7, 1948, and since some apologists for Alger Hiss have tried to minimize the importance of the documents which he delivered to his Communist contacts it might be well to include in this report for the permanent record a few direct quotations from the hearings on December 7 dealing with the significance of the documents procured from the pumpkins as well as the copies provided by Chambers of the exhibits he displayed in Baltimore.

The first witness called on December 7 was Mr. Sumner Welles since he was serving as Under Secretary of State at the time the documents were delivered by Hiss to Chambers. Our committee was in a quandry as to how significant to our national security these State Department papers might be even though a number of years had passed since their disappearance from the State Department files. It was in an effort to determine what action we should take on this point that Mr. Welles was called as a witness.

As appears on page 1387 of hearings, Mr. Welles was asked by Mr. Stripling:

Mr. STRIPLING. Mr. Welles, I would like to ask you if in 1938 a document was marked whether or not it would be classified as a "strictly confidential, for the Secretary" whether or not it would be classified as a "top secret" document?

Mr. WELLES. Decidedly so, Mr. Stripling.

Mr. STRIPLING. One of these documents, which has been turned over to the committee in response to the subpena served on Mr. Cleveland, is dated February 15, 1938, 4 p. m. It says: "Telegram sent Amlegation, Vienna." I will ask you, Mr. Welles, to examine this document and tell the committee whether the public interest would be violated, or the national interest and security would be violated by the publication of that document.

Mr. WELLES. Mr. Chairman, I believe that this document also if published now would be prejudicial to the Nation's interests.

Mr. STRIPLING. Mr. Welles, were any of these messages which I have shown you, would they be sent in code? Is there anything to indicate that they were sent in code originally?

Mr. WELLES. All of these messages, Mr. Stripling, originally were sent in code and undoubtedly those marked "strictly confidential" or "strictly confidential, for the Secretary," would presumably be sent in one of the most secret codes then in our possession.

Mr. STRIPLING. Would the possession of the document as translated, along with the original document as it appeared in code, furnish an individual with the necessary information to break the code?

Mr. WELLES. In my judgment, decidedly yes.

Having thus established the significance of these documents and the fact that it would be injurious to our national security to publish them the following statement appears in the hearings:

Mr. MUNDT. Mr. Stripling, it would occur to me that inasmuch as these documents are quite apparently of such significance that the contents cannot be disclosed at a public hearing of this nature without certainly examining each one in detail, that we should not take the time to do that at this hearing today; that Mr. Welles has served his purpose as a witness at a public hearing, and at an executive session we could go into this matter in further detail, for the purpose of helping to sort out the evidence to make sure that nothing of vital danger to our national security is made public.

Then, Mr. President, to make a double check on the actual significance of the documents relayed by Hiss to Chambers our committee called before it Mr. John Peurifoy, Assistant Secretary of State in the State Department. On page 1391 of the hearings the following testimony appears:

Mr. MUNDT. Mr. Peurifoy, I believe your title is Assistant Secretary of State in charge of security; at least that describes the purview of your authority; is that correct?

Mr. PEURIFOY. In charge of administration, sir, which includes security.

Mr. MUNDT. You have been in the room, have you not, and have heard all of the testimony given by Mr. Sumner Welles?

Mr. PEURIFOY. Yes, sir.

Mr. MUNDT. Mr. Stripling will now show you the documents which he showed to Mr. Welles and ask you some questions concerning them.

Mr. PEURIFOY. Yes, sir.

Mr. STRIPLING. Mr. Chairman, I will show him the same three documents, ask that he read them all three carefully, and then we will take them up in the order in which Mr. Welles considered them.

Without burdening the RECORD with all the questions and answers, Mr. President, let it be recorded here that Mr. Peurifoy supported completely the statement of Mr. Welles that release of these documents, even in 1948, would be detrimental to our national security and our foreign policy.

I think it illuminating, however, to call attention to the fact that on page 1393 of the hearings, Representative HÉBERT, of Louisiana, who also rendered Trojan service as a member of our special subcommittee asked this question:

Mr. HÉBERT. Mr. Peurifoy, in your position in charge of security for the State Department, would you say that documents in the number of 200 pages removed from the Department would prima facie indicate that they had been taken for a purpose detrimental to the United States Government?

Mr. PEURIFOY. I would so.

Mr. HÉBERT. And anybody taking them could not be perchance, or by accident; it would have to be some systematic removal of these documents from the files for a purpose not in the interests of the United States Government?

Mr. PEURIFOY. I would agree with that, sir.

A little later, Representative NIXON took over the questioning of Mr. Peurifoy and said:

Mr. NIXON. I understand that where a document is classified, at least where it is classified to the extent of "Strictly Confidential" or "Strictly Confidential for the Secretary," that the document is not supposed to be removed from the Department to the person's home?

Mr. PEURIFOY. That is right, sir.

Mr. NIXON. And if a document of such a nature were removed to a person's home, and there copied or there digested by that person, that in itself would be a breach of the State Department's rules.

Mr. PEURIFOY. It would, sir.

In concluding that day's testimony, Mr. President, and dismissing Mr. Peurifoy, I made a statement which I felt to be true then and which I feel to be even more emphatically true today. I quote from page 1397 of the record:

Mr. MUNDT. Thank you very much, Mr. Peurifoy, and I might say before we break up it is a sad commentary, but it certainly stands axiomatically before us all when we find in the possession of Russian agents in this country material so secretive and so vital to our national defense that we cannot make it available to the American public. That seems to be the situation we are now confronted with. The meeting stands adjourned.

Mr. President, insofar as the chronology by which the original testimony of Whittaker Chambers was slowly but surely substantiated by confessions, witnesses, and documents and finally corroborated by the grand-jury indictment and verdict of guilty by the trial court in New York, that pretty well completes the record. However, in response to requests which have come from several Senators for a more detailed chronology of the manner in which this strange and startling case evolved, and inasmuch as the hearings and reports have been in such great demand for so long a time that they are now completely exhausted, I have compiled for the information of those desiring it a chronological record of the Whittaker Chambers-Alger Hiss case before the House Committee on Un-American Activities of the Eightieth Congress, second session, which, with the permission of the Senate, I will insert at this point in the RECORD. Following this insertion I wish to call attention specifically to some of the issues which are raised and some of the questions left unanswered as a consequence of the conviction of Alger Hiss and the clear-cut realization that Communist contacts of the Russian agents received for many years a highly placed and highly influential member of our State Department.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD at this point the chronological record of the Whittaker Chambers-Alger Hiss case before the House Un-American Activities Committee.

There being no objection, the matter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

CHRONOLOGICAL RECORD OF WHITTAKER CHAMBERS-ALGER HISS CASE BEFORE HOUSE UN-AMERICAN ACTIVITIES COMMITTEE, EIGHTIETH CONGRESS, SECOND SESSION

August 3, 1948, David Whittaker Chambers appeared as a witness before the Committee on Un-American Activities, United States House of Representatives. He gave the following testimony:

He was senior editor of Time magazine in New York City.

He was born April 1, 1901, in Philadelphia.

He had been associated with Time magazine for 9 years.

Prior to that time he was a member of the Communist Party and a paid functionary of the party.

He first joined the Communist Party in 1924 in New York City.

He remained a member of the Communist Party until 1937.

For a number of years he had served in the Communist underground, chiefly in Washington, D. C. The underground organization was developed, to the best of his knowledge by Harold Ware, one of the sons of the Communist leader known as Mother Bloor (Ella Reeve Bloor).

He knew it at its top level, a group of seven or so men, from among whom in later years certain members of Miss Bentley's organization were apparently recruited. (The reference was to Elizabeth Terrill Bentley, who had testified before the committee July 31, 1948.)

The head of the Washington underground at the time he knew it was Nathan Witt, an attorney for the National Labor Relations Board. Later, John Abt became the leader. Lee Pressman was also a member of this group, as was Alger Hiss, who as a member of the State Department, later organized the conferences at Dumbarton Oaks, San Francisco, and the United States side of the Yalta Conference.

The purpose of this group at that time was not primarily espionage. Its original purpose was the Communist infiltration of the American Government. But espionage was certainly one of its eventual objectives.

Other members of this group were Donald Hiss, Victor Perlo, Charles Kramer (Kramer's original name was Krevitsky), and Henry Collins.

During the period he was with the underground group in Washington, Henry Collins was in the Department of Agriculture, Alger Hiss was, he thought, in the Munitions Investigation Committee (Special Senate Committee Investigating the Munitions Industry), and Donald Hiss, he thought, was in the Labor Department, connected with immigration. A number of these men had been in the AAA, the Agricultural Adjustment Administration. He thought at that time Witt had already entered the National Labor Relations Board. Lee Pressman was in the AAA at one time. He had forgotten where John Abt was employed at that time. He believed Victor Perlo was employed by the Brookings Institution at that time.

He knew Donald Hiss as the younger brother of Alger Hiss.

Originally he came to Washington to act as a courier between New York and Washington, which in effect was between this apparatus and New York.

He met with the men he mentioned at the apartment of Henry Collins, which was at St. Matthews Court here in Washington. It wasn't called a headquarters, but the St. Matthews Court apartment was the closest thing to headquarters it had.

Hal Ware undoubtedly had an apartment, but no one met there that he knew of. Ware's sister had a violin studio near Dupont Circle, which was used as a kind of casual meeting place or rendezvous for members of the group.

All the group meetings were held in Henry Collins' apartment, not in the studio.

The woman who ran the studio was Helen Ware.

When he met with these people at Mr. Collins' apartment, he did not collect Communist Party dues from them, but the Communist Party dues were handed over to him by Collins, who was the treasurer of that group.

All of these people were members of the Communist Party.

J. Peters was, to the best of his knowledge, the head of the whole underground United States Communist Party. He, from time to time, came to Washington.

Ultimately Peters must have been responsible for the setting up of this group. He was certainly Harold Ware's superior.

He had been told what J. Peters real name was, he thought it was Goldenweis, or some such name. (Robert E. Stripling, the committee's chief investigator, asked Chambers if it was Goldberger, and Chambers repeated that name.)

Peters was known to him for years simply as Peters.

Peters told him at one time that he had been a petty officer in the Austrian Army during World War I. After the Bela Kun revolution in Hungary, he was a member of the Soviet Government of Hungary, he thought, in the agricultural commissariat.

When Mr. Stripling asked Chambers if it was his understanding that, in Communist Party circles, he (Peters) had for years been known as the head of the underground, Chambers replied that it was.

When asked if he knew whether Peters ever became an American citizen, Chambers said he did not know. He thought the presumption was probably he did not. When Mr. Stripling said Peters was not an American citizen, Chambers said he was not surprised.

Peters once explained to him his process of securing false passports. He told him with great amusement because of the simplicity of the scheme. He had sent up to the genealogical division of the New York Public Library a group of young Communists, he presumed, who collated the birth and death records; that is, they found that a child had been born, let us say, in 1900 and died a month or so later or several months later. The party through some members then wrote to the proper authorities in New York for issuing birth certificates and asked for a birth certificate in the name of that dead child. The certificate was forthcoming and a passport was then applied for under that name by someone using that birth certificate.

The dues Chambers collected at the apartment of Collins were not simply from the seven people. Dues were from the whole apparatus, cells which were headed by these seven people.

He didn't know how much money was turned over to him from time to time. His impression was that it was a considerable sum. He believed he heard that because at that time the dues were 10 percent of whatever the individual's salary was.

He brought Communist literature and instructions from New York to Washington as well as to collect the dues.

Chambers was for 3 years the actual editor of the Daily Worker. The nominal editor was Robert Minor. That was from about 1926 until 1929.

When he left the Communist Party in 1937 the only one of the seven in the Washington underground he approached to break with him was Alger Hiss. He went to the Hiss home one evening with what he considered considerable risk to himself and found Mrs. Hiss at home. Mrs. Hiss was also a member of the Communist Party. Mrs. Donald Hiss, he believed, was not.

Mrs. Hiss attempted while he was there to make a call which he could only presume was to other Communists, but he quickly went to the telephone and she hung up, and Mr. Hiss came in shortly afterward, and they talked and he (Chambers) tried to break him away from the party. As a matter of fact, Hiss cried when they separated, but Hiss absolutely refused to break.

He was very fond of Mr. Hiss. Hiss' reasons why he did not want to sever the relationship were simply the party line.

He (Chambers) knew Harry Dexter White. He couldn't say positively that White was a registered member of the Communist Party, but he certainly was a fellow traveler so far within the fold that his not being a Communist would be a mistake on both sides.

When he left the Communist Party he (Chambers) also went to White to ask him to break away from the Communist movement. White left him in a very agitated frame of mind, and he thought he had succeeded. Apparently he did not. Miss Bentley's testimony and certain things he heard from other sources assured him that he had failed. (Harry Dexter White was identified as Assistant Secretary of the Treasury and head of Monetary Research.)

After he had been in Washington a while it was very clear that some of the members of these groups were going places in the Government. That was about 1936. One of them clearly was Alger Hiss, and it was believed that Henry Collins also might go farther. Another was Lee Pressman. So it was decided by Peters, or by Peters in conference with others, that they would take these people out of that apparatus and separate them from it physically—that is, they would have no further intercourse with the people there—but they would be connected with that apparatus and with Peters through him (Chambers). It was also decided to add to this group certain other people who had not originally been in that apparatus. One of those people was Harry White.

These people were specifically not wanted to act as sources of information. These people were an elite group, an outstanding group, which it was believed would rise to positions—as, indeed, some of them did—notably Mr. White and Mr. Hiss—in the Government, and their position in the Government would be of very much more service to the Communist Party.

Asked if he knew where Alger Hiss was then employed, Chambers said he believed Hiss was the head of the Carnegia Foundation for World Peace.

He thought Donald Hiss, who was also in the State Department, was then in Mr. Corcoran's (Tommy Corcoran) law firm in Washington, and was connected with the negotiating of the loan to Poland.

He couldn't say where any of the other seven people were then employed.

In 1939 about 2 days after the Hitler-Stalin pact, Chambers came to Washington to report to the Government authorities concerning the Communists who were in the Government.

Isaac Don Levine, now the editor of Plain Talk, approached the late Marvin McIntyre, Mr. Roosevelt's secretary, and asked him what would be the most proper form in which the information Chambers had to give could be brought before President Roosevelt. Mr. McIntyre told Mr. Levine that Mr. A. A. Berle, the Assistant Secretary of State, was Mr. Roosevelt's man in intelligence matters. Chambers then went to see Mr. Berle and told him much of what he was telling the committee. When he saw Mr. Berle, he named specific names, Mr. Hiss among others.

He didn't mention Mr. White to Mr. Berle because at that time he thought he had broken Mr. White away. It was about 4 years later that he first told the FBI about Mr. White.

He was not informed of any action taken as a result of his report to Mr. Berle. A great deal later he discovered apparently nothing had been done.

August 5, 1948, Alger Hiss appeared before the committee at his own request. He denied unqualifiedly the statements about him which were made before the committee by Whittaker Chambers on August 3.

Hiss told the committee:

"I am not and never have been a member of the Communist Party. I do not and never have adhered to the tenets of the Communist Party. I am not and never have been a member of any Communist-front organization. I have never followed the Communist Party line, directly or indirectly. To the best of my knowledge none of my friends are Communists.

"As a State Department official I have had contacts with representatives of foreign governments, some of whom have undoubtedly been members of the Communist Party, as, for example, representatives of the Soviet Government. My contacts with any foreign representative who could possibly have been a Communist have been strictly official.

"To the best of my knowledge I never heard of Whittaker Chambers until in 1947, when two representatives of the Federal Bureau of Investigation asked me if I knew him and various other people, some of whom I knew and some of whom I did not know. I said I did not know Chambers. So far as I know I have never laid eyes on him, and I should like to have the opportunity to do so.

"I have known Henry Collins since we were boys in camp together. I knew him again while he was at the Harvard Business School while I was at the Harvard Law School, and I have seen him from time to time since I came to Washington in 1933.

"Lee Pressman was in my class at the Harvard Law School and we were both on the Harvard Law Review at the same time. We were also both assistants to Judge Jerome Frank on the legal staff of the Agricultural Adjustment Administration. Since I left the Department of Agriculture I have seen him only occasionally and infrequently. I left the Department, according to my recollection, in 1935.

"Witt and Abt were both members of the legal staff of the AAA. I knew them both in that capacity. I believe I met Witt in New York a year or so before I came to Washington. I came to Washington in 1933. We were both practicing law in New York at the time I think I met Witt.

"Kramer was in another office of the AAA, and I met him in that connection.

"I have seen none of these last three men I have mentioned except most infrequently since I left the Department of Agriculture.

"I don't believe I ever knew Victor Perlo.

"Except as I have indicated, the statements made about me by Mr. Chambers are complete fabrications. I think my record in the Government service speaks for itself."

Hiss said he entered the Government in 1933 at the urging of Jerome Frank, Felix Frankfurter, and other Government officials.

He said he was urged to become president of the Carnegie Endowment for International Peace in 1947 at the urging of John Foster Dulles and other members of the board of trustees.

He denied also that his wife had been a Communist or a member of any Communist front.

August 7, 1948 (executive session testimony made public August 25, 1948): Chambers told the committee he knew Hiss, roughly, between 1935 and 1937. He said Hiss knew him by the party name of Carl.

He again stated Hiss was a member of the Communist Party. He said he had been told that by Mr. Peters.

Chambers gave many details about Hiss, his family, different houses in which the Hisses had lived, etc. He said he stayed with Hiss one time for as long as a week.

He told of a Ford roadster, very dilapidated, with hand windshield wipers which he said Hiss insisted that he wanted to turn over to the open party so it could be of use to some poor organizer in the West or somewhere. He described a new Plymouth which he said Hiss got in 1936.

August 16, 1948 (executive session testimony made public August 25, 1948): Hiss testified that he did not recall anyone by the name of Carl "that could be remotely connected with the kind of testimony Mr. Chambers has given."

He denied knowing J. Peters. He said he thought he had been in the St. Matthew's Court apartment of Henry Collins on social occasions.

At this hearing Hiss thought he remembered Chambers as a man he had known by the name of George Crosley. He said he had met Crosley when he (Hiss) was working for the Nye Munitions Investigating Committee, that Crosley was a free-lance writer who had come to him for information because he was hoping to sell articles to magazines about the munitions industry. Hiss said he had sublet his apartment to this George Crosley on Twenty-ninth Street for the summer months of 1935 and had thrown in his old Ford as part of the deal. He claimed he handed over the title of the car to Crosley and had no idea if Crosely had recorded the title.

He said that Crosley and his wife and infant had stayed with the Hisses a couple of nights in their house at 2905 P Street because their moving van had been delayed. He also told of making a loan of cash to Crosley. He said he hadn't seen Crosley since 1935.

August 17, 1948 (executive session testimony made public Aug. 24, 1948): At this hearing Hiss and Chambers confronted each other. Hiss examined Chambers' teeth because when he had known him as George Crosley he said Chambers had very bad teeth. Chambers testified that he had had dental work since 1934 of a substantial nature.

Hiss made positive his identification of Chambers as the George Crosley he had known.

Hiss challenged Chambers at this hearing to make the statements he had made before the committee in public.

August 25, 1948: The public confrontation of Alger Hiss with Whittaker Chambers took place at this hearing.

Hiss identified Chambers as the man he had known as George Crosley. He said he first knew Crosley in the winter of 1934 or 1935, and last saw him in 1935.

Chambers identified Alger Hiss. He said he first saw him about 1934 and last saw him about 1938.

Hiss repeated his recollection of Chambers as Crosley, of having orally arranged the sublease of his apartment on Twenty-eighth Street (apartment 42, 2831 Twenty-eighth Street NW.) to Crosley in the summer of 1935, and of turning his 1929 Ford roadster over to Crosley, and loaning Crosley some money.

Records introduced showed the Hiss tenancy in the Twenty-eighth Street apartment began July 1, 1934, for 1 year; that Hiss vacated it on June 28, 1935; that the apartment was vacant for the month of July 1935, and on August 1, 1935, was rented to W. E. Isemann.

Records also showed the house to which the Hiss family moved from the Twenty-eighth Street apartment was rented to Priscilla Hiss for 1 year from May 1, 1935, to June 15, 1936. The address of the house was 2905 P Street NW.

Hiss testified he had not been able to find any witness other than his wife who remembered Chambers as George Crosley.

Hiss recalled having two autos at one time. Records showed Hiss bought a new Plymouth September 7, 1935. (This was after the time he had said he had given Crosley his old Ford which he didn't need because he had another car but had been keeping for sentimental reasons.)

Hiss repeated his recollection that he gave Crosley the use of the Ford car, as he gave him the use of the apartment on Twenty-eighth Street.

Records introduced showed that on July 23, 1936, Hiss assigned title to the Ford car to the Cherner Motor Co., of Washington. The reassignment of title reflected that on the same date, July 23, 1936, one William Rosen became the purchaser of the car.

Confronted with a photostatic copy of the assignment of title, Hiss admitted the signature on it of Alger Hiss looked like his signature. He said, however, his best recollection was that he gave the car to Crosley, either for a loan or by transfer, and had no recollection of transferring the car to the Cherner Motor Co., and no recollection of receiving any payment for it. He had no recollection of the name Rosen.

Hiss recalled that shortly after he was elected president of the Carnegie Endowment but before he assumed office, he had a conversation with John Foster Dulles in which Mr. Dulles told him he had heard reports that people had called him (Hiss) a Communist.

"I can only assume—this being at least a month before I assumed office—that Mr. Dulles was satisfied that there was nothing to the reports, as I was myself."

Hiss said the matter was discussed with Mr. Dulles sometime in December 1946. He assumed office as president of the Carnegie Endowment on February 1, 1947.

Hiss recalled how, in 1946, he had gone to the FBI office to offer himself for an inquiry into charges that he was a Communist after Justice Byrnes, then the Secretary of State, told him several Members of Congress were preparing to make statements on the floor of Congress that he was. He said Justice Byrnes asked him if he was and he told Mr. Byrnes he was not. He said he thought his meeting with the FBI people then had disposed of the matter.

Hiss said he never heard until August 3, 1948, that Whittaker Chambers had made accusations about him to Mr. Berle in 1939. However, he said he heard in the winter of 1948 that a man named Chambers had said he was a Communist.

Mr. MUNDT reviewed the testimony of Chambers and Hiss up to this point and called attention to the conflicts in the stories of the two men.

Hiss read a statement he had prepared into the record, mentioning the names of prominent Government officials and others who he said knew of his character and work. In the statement Hiss raised a question about Chambers' sanity.

Hiss had no recollection of seeing Crosley in the Collins' apartment in St. Matthew's Court, nor any recollection of seeing Crosley in Hiss' house on Thirtieth Street. He took the Thirtieth Street house in July 1936.

Hiss was reasonably positive he didn't see Crosley in 1936 or 1937.

He repeated that, to the best of his recollection, he never saw Crosley except at the Twenty-eighth Street apartment, in his (Hiss') office in the Senate Office Building when he was chief attorney for the Nye Investigating Committee, in Hiss' home on P Street, when he had lunch with Crosley, and "perhaps if" he drove Crosley to New York one time.

Chambers gave his full name as J. David Whittaker Chambers. He gave the positions he held in the Communist Party as follows: One time a writer on the Daily Worker, later foreign news editor of the Daily Worker, editor of the New Masses, and a functionary in the underground.

He testified he was first introduced to Hiss by Harold Ware and J. Peters, in a Washington restaurant. He said he then continued to know Mr. Hiss until he broke with the Communist Party in early 1938, and saw Mr. Hiss once again toward the end of 1938.

He denied ever meeting Hiss at the offices of the Nye Investigating Committee in the Senate Office Building.

He said he saw Hiss at the latter's Twenty-eighth Street apartment around 20 times. He denied being known to Hiss as George Crosley, and denied Hiss had subleased the Twenty-eighth Street apartment to him, or had sold him a 1929 Ford.

Chambers said Hiss let him and his family occupy the Twenty-eighth Street apartment for several weeks in the early summer of 1935, and it was at Hiss's suggestion they did. Also, Chambers testified, he and his family were guests in the Hiss home on P Street.

Chambers described the set-up of the Communist underground in Washington, as follows: "Mr. Harold Ware, who is the son of Ella Reeve Bloor, a well-known Communist, had gone down to Washington, to the best of my knowledge, about 1933. He was chiefly interested in farm activities of some kind, but he discovered, after he got there, that he could recruit a large number of people in the Government for the Communist Party. It is possible that some of the people were Communists already, and he simply came in touch with them; others, I am sure, he recruited himself. He set up, perhaps with the help of J. Peters, an apparatus consisting of a number of organizations, a number of cells, each cell being led by a man who formed part of a committee, and an underground committee which met regularly at the home of Henry Collins in St. Matthews Court."

Chambers said he saw Alger Hiss at the Collins' apartment about five times. Hiss was separated from that group rather early, he explained, because "the intention was to set up a parallel group of men whose opportunities for penetrating into the Government and arriving at positions of power and influence seemed best."

Chambers said "Hiss obeyed party discipline in every respect."

When he and his family moved into Hiss's Twenty-eighth Street apartment, they brought no furniture, Chambers related. Hiss let him occupy the apartment for nothing, Chambers added, "because Mr. Hiss and I were Communists, and that was a comradely way of treating one another. There is nothing unusual in such a procedure among Communists."

Chambers testified when he first knew him Hiss had a Ford, and after that got a Plymouth. He said he and Hiss made one trip together in the Plymouth to New York, and he believed Mrs. Hiss went along, some time in 1936 or 1937. Hiss had the Ford for some time after he got the Plymouth, Chambers said. As he had previously, Chambers told how Hiss disposed of the Ford through an individual in the Washington Communist Party who owned or worked in a service station and old-car lot. "The plan was for Mr. Hiss to take the Ford and leave it at the car lot, which he did."

Chambers told the committee he saw Hiss constantly during 1936 and 1937, as often as once a week, or "once a fortnight, to be on the conservative side."

Asked if he had any comment on the charge made in the hearings that he had been treated for a mental illness, Chambers replied, "Yes; I have never been treated for a mental illness—period." He said he had never been treated in a mental institution and had never been charged or convicted of a crime.

Chambers again related the story of how he tried to get Hiss to break away from the party.

He testified he was very fond of Hiss; that Hiss was "perhaps my closest friend * * * certainly the closest friend I ever had in the Communist Party."

Asked what motive he had for accusing Hiss of being a Communist, Chambers replied:

"The story has spread that in testifying against Mr. Hiss I am working out some old grudge or motives of revenge or hatred. I do not hate Mr. Hiss. We were close friends, but we are caught in a tragedy of history. Mr. Hiss represents the concealed enemy against which we are all fighting, and I am fighting.

"I have testified against him with remorse and pity, but in a moment of history in which this Nation now stands, so help me God, I could not do otherwise."

Mr. MUNDT brought out at this point that Chambers did not come to the committee voluntarily for the purpose of testifying against Hiss or anybody else, but was subpenaed without advance notice by the committee.

Chambers said it was 5 days after the Hitler-Stalin pact of August 26, 1939, not 2 days after, as he had testified previously, that he told Adolf Berle, who was then the Under Secretary of State, about the underground apparatus. He reiterated the circumstances of that meeting with Mr. Berle.

Chambers repeated that the Hisses always knew him as Carl. He said Mr. or Mrs. Hiss, at his last meeting with them in 1938, told him Peters had told them, or the party had told them who he was, so he assumed they knew his real name, but they didn't tell him what the name was.

Chambers ended his testimony this day with the following statement in reply to a question from Mr. MUNDT:

"It is unquestionable that they (Communist cells) are still functioning in government, and will continue to function until they are rooted out. It may be during a period like this when a number of investigative agencies are looking into the matter, they are resting on their oars for a while, but they remain in being."

August 27, 1948 (executive session testimony made public in printed hearings):

Chambers was called before the committee to give information concerning his acquisition of a piece of property in Westminster, Md. He said he and Hiss had talked of getting a small place in the country somewhere; later Hiss unearthed an advertisement of the Westminster place and made a down payment. Hiss then took Mrs. Hiss to the place, and she didn't like it or the countryside, whereupon Hiss called off his arrangement with the real-estate dealer, Chambers testified. Chambers said he made one trip to the place with Hiss in the latter's Ford. Chambers added that sometime later he acquired the place under his name but didn't let Hiss know he had, because he didn't want Hiss to know his real name.

In the course of this hearing Chambers said he had frequently discussed communism with Hiss. Asked if Hiss had pronounced views on communism or interpretations of Marxism, Chambers replied: "He had not unusual interpretations. His views—he understood Marxism very well, and had accepted it very completely. There wasn't very great ground for theoretical discussion. In other words, we talked more, I think, in the realm of current affairs, interpretations of current affairs, in the light of communism."

Asked if he and Hiss had discussed likely prospects for the underground apparatus with which they were connected, Chambers replied:

"Yes; we did, and the one whom Mr. Hiss believed to be the most likely was a man named Noel Field. Mr. Field was in what was then the West European Division of the State Department. I don't know what his position was, but he may have been head of the Division. Hiss believed that Field was already very strongly pro-Communist.

"Now, how he knew that I have forgotten, but I presume by conversation. He made a number of attempts to draw Field in and only to discover at the show-down that Field was connected with another apparatus."

August 30, 1948:

At this hearing Chambers identified Alexander Stevens, who had been subpenaed before the committee in New York, as the person who went under the name of J. Peters and with whom Chambers said he worked in the Communist apparatus in Washington.

Chambers told how, when he decided to get a job in the Government in Washington in 1937, Communists to whom he communicated this desire got him one very quickly paying more than $6,000 a year with "the so-called national research or Federal research project." He said the job was arranged for him within a matter of days, probably within 24 hours or so. "I would say that this is a spectacular instance of the ease with which a Communist could at all times slide other Communists into practically any Government agency in which they had a foothold," Chambers testified.

Mr. MUNDT. Mr. President, I think there are four or five unanswered questions and prevailing issues leading to recommended action which grow out of the conviction of Alger Hiss. One is that many Americans are rightfully concerned, Mr. President, about what impact Alger Hiss had, and, more important, what influence do his friends and ideological associates in the State Department today have in the formation of our foreign policy?

The first part of this question is easier to answer than the second. Alger Hiss held at least four strategic positions in the State Department in which to smuggle out information, and, of even greater significance, in which to influence foreign-policy decision both through his personal powers of persuasion and by staffing the post with other Communist sympathizers willing to carry on for him after he moved up to a new vantage point of operations.

These four strategic positions were as—

(a) A high functionary in the Far Eastern Division making recommendations on our policy toward China.

(b) The executive secretary of the Dumbarton Oaks Conference.

(c) The Secretary General of the San Francisco Conference.

(d) A personal and confidential adviser to President Roosevelt and Secretary of State Stettinius before and during the entire Yalta Conference.

To that we might add that he was American adviser to the United States delegation in London for a time, after the Charter was approved.

While each of these positions was of major magnitude and offered great opportunity for injury to the free side of the ideological contest being waged against international communism, the activities of Alger Hiss in helping to frame our foreign policy toward China and his influence at Yalta are by far the most significant of the four from the standpoint of protecting our security and preserving our peace. Therefore, in connection with the activities of Alger Hiss at San Franciso, in the writing of the United Nations Charter, it suffices for me to give the following quotation from page 27 of Time magazine for April 16, 1945, and I quote from Time magazine appearing under the heading of "Conferences":

> The Secretary General for the San Francisco Conference was named at Yalta but announced only last week—lanky, Harvard-trained, Alger Hiss, one of the State Department's brighter young men.

Mr. President, I call attention to the point that he was named at Yalta. As I continue with the disclosures of what happened at Yalta, I think it will become clear how it happened that he was named in the Crimea, instead of here in Washington, D. C.

I read further from the Time magazine article:

> Alger Hiss was one of the Harvard Law School students whose records earned them the favor of Prof. (now Justice) Felix Frankfurter—

That is the Frankfurter who testified as a character witness, by the way, at the first trial of Alger Hiss, the Frankfurter who dragged the hallowed robes of justice from the Supreme Court to the criminal court, to testify for a man who now has been found guilty of perjury.

I repeat what I was reading from the Time magazine article:

> Alger Hiss was one of the Harvard Law School students whose records earned them the favor of Prof. (now Justice) Felix Frankfurter and a year as secretary to the late Justice Oliver Wendell Holmes. He was drafted from a New York law firm by the New Deal in 1933, joined the State Department in 1936, accompanied President Roosevelt to Yalta.
> At San Francisco he and his secretariat of 300 (mostly Americans) will have the drudging, thankless clerk's job of copying, translating, and publishing, running the thousands of paper-clip and pencil chores of an international meeting. But Alger Hiss will be an important figure there. As Secretary General, managing the agenda, he will have a lot to say behind the scenes about who gets the breaks.

Mr. President, I have been quoting from an article published in Time magazine.

It was important, was it not, to know who was going to get the breaks as we were writing the United Nations Charter, which became the over-all charter for the world after the war. A little break here and a little break there, something of advantage here, something slipped under the table there—what an advantage it was to have a pal at that post. It disturbs many Americans, these days, to know that the man then in a position to hand out the breaks, last Saturday afternoon in New York was found guilty of disloyal actions to this country, confirming the startling and astounding testimony of Whittaker Chambers about the whole insidious course of action of Alger Hiss in the State Department.

Insofar as the opportunities for Alger Hiss to exert his pro-Communist influence at Yalta are concerned, permit me, Mr. President, to quote from two authentic books written on the subject of the Yalta Conference. Former Secretary of State James F. Byrnes, in his book, Speaking Frankly, frequently refers to the fact that President Roosevelt at Yalta was in ill health, and virtually all of those writing about Yalta from an intimate knowledge of the facts agree that the President was not in physical or mental vigor sufficient to permit him to devote to that conference the careful study and advance preparation which our national interests warranted and which that all-important conference deserved. For example, on page 23 of the book, Speaking Frankly, former Secretary of State Byrnes says flatly:

> So far as I could see, the President had made little preparation for the Yalta Conference.

Mr. President, perhaps I should read that again, because we had won a great military victory, and that was a conference which was going to determine the peace, and that was the President who was going to represent American interests at the writing of the peace. Because he was ill, because he was fatigued, because he was just recovering from the rigors of his fourth-term campaign, it is understandable that he could not spend too much time getting ready. But I think we should know that Secretary of State Byrnes says this, in so many words—and Secretary Byrnes was there at the time:

> So far as I could see, the President had made little preparation for the Yalta Conference.

That is the statement made by Jimmy Byrnes, a great friend of the late President. He says plainly that the President had made little preparation for the Yalta Conference. I read that statement in no criticism of President Roosevelt. I say that simply to highlight the fact that someone had to make some preparations for Yalta. Since the President did not make them—since he was too tired, since he was too sick, since he was too worn from his fourth-term campaign—he could not make them. Someone made them. Mr. President, I should think that students of foreign policy and defenders of America would be curious to know who made the studies before Yalta, who was providing the advice, who was laying the ground work, who was preparing the guns, so to speak, for the President to fire. Secretary Byrnes says the President did not make the preparations for the Yalta Conference.

Secretary Byrnes also relates that the advisers of the State Department had gone ahead as far as Malta, and that the President met with Stettinius and his advisers at that outpost, in preparation for the Yalta Conference.

So now we see the picture. The President proceeded by ship—ill, tired, recovering from a hard campaign, unable to prepare for one of the most important global conferences in history; and a group of men had gone ahead to Malta to fix up the decisions President Roosevelt was supposed to plead for when he got to the Crimea, to the Yalta Conference. Therefore, I wish to bring into evidence a few other witnesses in regard to the status of the President's health at that time; because, if we are going to assay properly the consequences at Yalta, it is imperative that we Americans know who made the decisions, who prepared for them, what was back of them.

Perhaps Jimmy Byrnes' testimony alone might be disputed when he observed that the President was not making the preparations. Perhaps the President was in the bloom of health. Perhaps Jimmy Byrnes' testimony alone might be disputed. So let us look to see what were the statements of other witnesses, other Americans, who were there at the time. I now give the Senate the statement of Henry L. Stimson, as found in his book, On Active Service, published in 1948. The statement appears at pages 574 to 575, if there are those who would like to pursue this matter further. In commenting upon the President's state of health preceding that important conference, we find these words—and I quote now the words of Henry L. Stimson:

> I have been much troubled by the President's physical condition. He was distinctly not himself Saturday (September 9). He had a cold and seemed tired out. I rather fear for the effects of this hard conference upon him. I am particularly troubled * * * that he is going up there without any real preparation for the solution of the underlying and fundamental problem of how to treat Germany. So far as he had evidenced it in his talks with us, he has had absolutely no study or training in the very difficult problem which we have to decide.

Mr. President, someone had to study those problems; someone had to say, "I am the man with the training and the bright ideas." I shall come to some suggestions, after awhile, to indicate, perhaps, who were those who filled the vacuum caused by the fact that the President was old and the President was ill and the President was tired and the President was badly worn from a harrowing political campaign. I wish to quote the words of another witness on this important subject of why and how Hiss was in a position to use his abilities and his personal charm and his loquacity, while serving at Yalta, to serve, shall we say, the Soviets, instead of the United States of America. So let us look further into the record. James A. Farley wrote a book entitled "Jim Farley's Story." That book also was published in 1948. I wish to quote a little of the information to be found in it. I refer to pages 363 to 377:

In our evaluation of President Roosevelt, Cordell—

and I agreed that he was a sick man at Yalta and should not have been called upon to make decisions affecting his country and the world. Physical illness, we knew, taxed the mind and left him in no shape to bargain with such hard bargainers as the Russians and such astute diplomats as the British.

On every side, I heard expressions of regret that he was not himself in the most critical days of world history. Had he not been physically and mentally tired at Teheran and Yalta, and at home, and had America had a more vigorous voice in international affairs, statesmen of the world are agreed almost without exception that many of the troubles vexing the world today would not have arisen.

Mr. President, I have just quoted, not the words of a Republican campaign manager or Republican campaign orator, but the uncolored, objective testimony of James A. Farley in his book Jim Farley's Story, published in 1948.

Let me quote one other authority along a similar line. I quote now from a book published in 1948, entitled "I saw Poland Betrayed," by Arthur Bliss Lane, of the State Department. He says:

The Department of State was not kept advised of the progress of the Crimea Conference (Yalta). * * * The first word regarding the conference which reached the State Department in Washington was the report by Jonathan Daniels, administrative assistant to the President. * * * A copy was immediately brought to me at my desk in the State Department. As I glanced over it, I could not believe my eyes. To me, almost every line spoke of a surrender to Stalin.

Mr. Roosevelt returned to Washington from the Crimea Conference, mortally fatigued by his journey. * * * On March 1 (1945) he addressed a joint session of Congress to report on the decisions reached at Yalta.

I think that is important background, because we are pursuing the question, if the President was not in a position to make the decisions at Yalta, who was to make them? Who else was there?

Edward R. Stettinius was Secretary of State at the time. I knew Ed Stettinius well, and admired him. I think he was an able, loyal American. When he came to the State Department, with no background or experience, and without any diplomatic training, he was cast immediately into some of the major roles of international policy, for which neither he nor any other human being could be adequately prepared. So he had to rely, as any of us would have done, upon advisers. I think students of history should try to determine the identity of the advisers. It becomes of tremendous significance to know just who comprised the coterie of advisers working with Mr. Stettinius and upon whom both the Secretary of State and President Roosevelt had to depend, in large part, for the facts and data and historic background so essential in the discussions and deliberations of the Yalta Conference. That brings us to another authentic book on the subject, this one written by Edward R. Stettinius, Jr., entitled "Roosevelt and the Russians—the Yalta Conference." It would be remembered, of course, that our Secretary of State at Yalta was Mr. Stettinius and not Mr. Byrnes.

From page 30 of the Stettinius book on Roosevelt and the Russians, I shall quote the testimony of Stettinius, the man, who, in the absence of an active, alert President, able to study the necessary background in order to make decisions, had to make them. I quote now the testimony of the man who made our decisions at Yalta, as to where he received his information and as to what kind of decision should be made. It is imperative, I think if we are properly to evaluate Yalta and to answer the questions which the honest men and women all over America are asking, and to make this plain. Honest men and women all over America tell me, "Senator, I cannot understand. How could we have failed so abysmally at Yalta?" As for me, I think we were lucky we did not give away twice as much as we did, when one really understands the kind of situation which existed at that point and at that time.

At the President's suggestion the State Department delegation flew to north Africa to spend a few days reviewing the American position on the various problems to be discussed in the Crimea, and then flew to Malta to conduct discussions with the British before he arrived.

The State Department experts who traveled with me to the conference were H. Freeman Matthews, director of the Office of European Affairs; Alger Hiss, deputy director of the Office of Special Political Affairs; and Wilder Foote, assistant to the Secretary of State.

Three advisers, and three only, are headlined there as those helping Stettinius, coming freshly and inexperienced to the job, to make decisions, to determine whether the victory we won in the war could preserve the definite peace and establish reasonable conditions throughout the world. Stettinius further writes:

At Malta and Yalta Ambassador Harriman and Charles Bohlen were also part of the State Department delegation. While I was in London in April 1944 Hiss had been transferred from the Office of Far Eastern Affairs—

Helping formulate the beginnings of a Chinese policy there, I presume—to the Office of Special Political Affairs.

In his book, Mr. Stettinius pays high tribute to the brilliant mind and to the important part Mr. Hiss played at the Yalta Conference. Mr. Stettinius had great confidence in Mr. Hiss, as demonstrated by comments over and over again in his book. Due to the untimely death of former Secretary of State Stettinius, he has been mercifully spared the unhappy realization of his betrayal by a man in whom he reposed such great confidence.

In all events, Secretary of State Stettinius, writing as a friend of Alger Hiss at a time when his disloyalty had not been established in a court of law, surely had no reason either unduly to expand upon or to minimize the part that Alger Hiss played in the deliberations at Yalta. Consequently, the following statement from the book authored by Mr. Stettinius takes on tremendous significance. He was the man who was seeking advice. He was the man who had to formulate the decisions. He was the man on whom Roosevelt had to depend for making the preparation which those who saw Roosevelt unanimously agreed he was unable to make by reason of the state of his health at the time of Yalta. Here is what Mr. Stettinius, in his book Roosevelt and the Russians, says. He begins on page 36 a delineation of the part which Hiss played at the Yalta Conference and at the deliberations, by saying, for example:

Among the questions reserved for subsequent discussion with the President at Yalta, which I reviewed with Matthews, Hiss, and Foote, were—

There were many interesting questions, as they appear in retrospect, when we consider Mr. Hiss, conniving at Yalta, getting read for decisions at Yalta to affect the following nine points of decision:

1. The establishment of a European High Commission composed of Great Britain, the Soviet Union, France, and the United States.

Perhaps that was the one that served as the background to the commission system in Europe. It does not say in detail, and it had no great significance, perhaps.

2. The treatment of Germany.

There was the scheme to make Germany a pastoral state, the scheme to keep a cancer operative in the central part of Europe, so there could be no recovery of Europe; and, without a recovery of Europe, there is always a vacuum into which the Communists are likely to pour. There were the preliminary decisions, ratified at Potsdam, to place the great Army of the United States in a tight little box in Berlin, with no access to our troops by way of canal, highway, or railroad. There for the first time in history, this most powerful of countries put an army of occupation in a doughnut ring surrounded by the iron steel of the Communist Army. The one who thought that up, at Yalta, certainly was not thinking primarily of protecting the United States.

Mr. THYE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. MUNDT. I am happy to yield.

Mr. THYE. The same situation exists at Vienna, Austria. It is occupied by Allied troops, and Austria is encircled by territory entirely within the control of the Russian Government.

Mr. MUNDT. Precisely. Merely to look at the situation and at the results, it seems to me, would drive an ordinarily alert individual to question what was going on at Yalta. The course of events and careful research now enable us to piece the pattern together—the position of the President, unable to think things through, himself, by reason of his health and his fatigue; the situation of the advisers meeting in advance, the identity of the advisers, the conviction of the chief adviser, not once, but five times, for guilty association with Communists and communism.

The first time Hiss was convicted, he convicted himself when he admitted in his own sworn testimony that he had lived as a friend in the home of the Communist conveyor and agent, Whittaker Chambers. The second time he was convicted was by a reluctant House Committee on Un-American Activities, which finally, after following the evidence for months, came to the inescapable conclusion that Hiss alone was the one who could deliver the secret State Department documents to Whittaker Chambers. The third time he was convicted was when the grand jury in New York indicted him for perjury. They said, "Mr. Hiss, you lied to us when you denied you took the highly classified State Department documents from the security files and delivered them to a foreign Communist agent." That was the indictment of the grand jury. The fourth time, I suppose it could not quite be said he was convicted, because 4 of the jurors held out, but 8 of the 12 found him guilty then. The fifth time, he was convicted by all 12. Now, a few of those who rallied to his defense too soon, who got caught trying to defend him at a time when the evidence had not all been disclosed, still say, in the face of the sworn testimony and confession of Alger Hiss, that he was just a nice young man, with a Harvard accent, and with a neat crease in the front of his trousers.

But I desire to talk a little bit more about what Alger Hiss had to do in the shaping of world history. The third thing they took up at Yalta was the Polish question. How convenient to have, on the American team, someone willing to say "yes" to Stalin, when he said at Yalta, "We Russians want to continue to keep and to control the portion of Poland that we won while fighting as an ally of Adolf Hitler in the early days of the war." The Communists do not like to hear about that. Even the psuedo progressives and the progressive liberals do not like any longer to hear about that. They like to forget the fact that in the early stages of the war, Russia and Germany were on the same side. The Nazis and the Communists had made common cause, as they should, because the distinctions and differences between them are most insignificant. At all events, when, without warning, the fiendish Nazis attacked Poland and the Poles were driven back toward Warsaw in that blitzkreig, suiting the occasion to the hour and undoubtedly to the secret commitments of the von Ribbentrop-Molotov agreement, the Communists attacked the Poles from the rear and obtained by bloodshed and force the portions of Poland east of the Curzon line.

It was thought necessary to have on the advisory staff someone who thought communism was a noble thing to make it easy for a tired individual, unable to prepare adequately for the occasion, to acquiesce in that kind of demand. Of course Russia took Poland and a portion of Germany as well, but that was not with our concurrence, at least, at Yalta, as it was with our concurrence when we said—and how shamefully, in my opinion—for the first time, and, I hope, for the only time in history, to the people of Poland, "We are going to try to buy security for America by driving Poland into slavery." We gave away into the black night of slavery the portions of Poland which Stalin said he wanted, because, after all, he and his pal, Adolf Hitler, had seized them while fighting together on the same side in the war.

We now come to the relations between UNRRA and the Soviet Government. If I could have started this speech earlier I could have dwelt at length on that subject, because I was assigned to study UNRRA in Europe, and I know from personal observation the facts upon which the congressional report was made. But few persons ever read a congressional report, so I would not expect the Senate to know about it. Yet that report shows that the UNRRA offices in Czechoslovakia and in Poland were openly and unashamedly being operated by the Communists, who tore the labels off UNRRA goods and frequently wrapped the goods in packages saying, in effect, "This is a gift from Uncle Joe."

We paid 74 percent of the cost and gave the Russians 50 percent of the authority at the top and put them in as managerial officers in most of the important outposts of the world. No wonder UNRRA died an unhonored and an unsung death, because in many areas it contributed to the growth of communism.

I salute the work which UNRRA did in Greece. There it served the cause of humanity and met the needs of little children. In Greece, however, a Canadian rather than a Communist was in charge of UNRRA.

The fifth question taken up at Yalta was the rights of American representatives on the Allied control commissions for Bulgaria, Rumania, and Hungary.

We were asked in Budapest one night by a very fine, able, and distinguished general from Oklahoma, by the name of Kee, to get them out of Hungary because the Allied commission was run by the Russians. He said, "We have no authority whatsoever as members of the Allied control commission in Hungary."

Maybe it was planned that way at Yalta. I do not know.

The sixth question referred to Iran. The seventh referred to China.

Mr. President, I am not going to succumb to the temptation to discuss China at any length. Certainly it does not test anyone's credulity very much to ask that we ponder a little bit what influence Alger Hiss might have had in writing a pro-Soviet foreign policy toward China when he was there, and in bringing about that most calamitous of all decisions at Yalta by which we agreed to give to the Russians control of the Communists in China and important installations in Manchuria.

For the record I should like to interpolate the statement that, in my opinion, America never has had so good a friend at any time as it had in the Nationalist Government of China when the bombs came dropping down on us at Pearl Harbor. I challenge anyone to show another country in the history of this Republic that ever fought a war for us. We have helped many other peoples. We have been in many contests. We have gone to the aid of other peoples and joined them in common cause. But here was a country willing to fight a war for us. After Pearl Harbor we were unable to fight with equal vigor the Nazis, the Fascists, and the Shinto priests of Japan. So we conferred with Chiang Kai-shek and said, "How about it, old fellow? Will you keep on trading dead Chinese soldiers for supplies for a little while? We want to concentrate our efforts in Europe against the Nazis and the Fascists."

I thought that was wise. I was a member of the House Foreign Affairs Committee at the time I heard of the plan and I said, "I think that is sound, wise, and good."

We said to China, "If we can do that, you keep on fighting the Japs for a while, the little yellow men who killed our American boys at Pearl Harbor. When we finish in Europe fighting the Italians and the Germans, who do not mean anything to you, we shall come over and help defeat the Japs."

The Nationalists agreed. They fought for us. We made them one magnanimous promise. We said, "If you do that, we will promise not to send any more scrap iron during the period of the war in which we find ourselves your ally."

China may not have a liberal government; I do not know. It may have many things wrong with it; I do not know. But I shall always remember that no other country in history, before or since, ever fought a war for us.

However, at Yalta we signed documents agreeing to turn over the prize possessions of our most unselfish ally to the Communists, for the second time at Yalta trying to buy security for ourselves by selling a friend into slavery and floating him down the river of despair.

Mr. President, in Mr. Stettinius' book he said he and Alger Hiss and a few others at Yalta were figuring out what to tell the President regarding China.

A close reading of the Stettinius book indicates the unique capacity which Alger Hiss demonstrated over and over again in his Government service for working his way into the confidence of persons in high position and for gradually assuming more and more control in the particular position to which he was assigned. It was also indicated by the telegram read into the RECORD by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. MCCARTHY] from poor, befuddled Dean Acheson this afternoon.

The following quotation from the book by Stettinius indicates that the favorite formula by which Alger Hiss expanded his influence was clearly operative at the Yalta Conference. On page 49 of the book Roosevelt and the Russians, Stettinius says:

Before dinner Hopkins, Bohlen, Kirk, Matthews, Hiss, and I had a discussion of the political and economic situation in Italy.

Later in the book, on page 83, Stettinius writes:

After these dinners, I usually conferred again with Matthews, Bohlen, Hiss, and Foote, read cables from Acting Secretary of State Grew in Washington, drafted cables to the Department, and then went to bed often as late as two in the morning.

On page 84 Stettinius writes referring to a different episode:

The next morning at 10:30 Harriman, Matthews, Hiss, Bohlen, and I met with the President of the sun porch, overlooking the sea, to review our proposals for the Conference agenda.

Later in the book, on page 103, Stettinius writes, in describing the manner in which the Conference officials gathered around the council tables:

The Americans, sitting behind the President, varied somewhat from session to session but usually included Hopkins, Matthews, and Hiss, and sometimes Foote.

On pages 195 and 196, Stettinius writes:

I pointed out to the President that I had reserved the American position on extra votes for the Soviet Union at the Foreign Ministers' meeting until I could talk to him again and that, as a result, a subcommittee, consisting of Gladwin Jebb—

Who was the British representative—

Gromyko—

Who was the Russian representative—and Hiss, representing the three nations, was now at work preparing a report.

A report, incidentally, Mr. President, which gave the Russians three votes to our one.

What a triumvirate. Poor Gladwin Jebb, with Gromyko and Alger Hiss, trying to figure out what to do to help free men.

It is more than an item of passing curiosity, Mr. President, that we hear how Alger Hiss was moving into positions of influence and authority at Yalta. First he was one of a group of six advisers to the Secretary of State to make the advance preparations for Yalta and to prepare information for the study of the President when they met at Malta before proceeding to the Crimea. Then we find him being included among those sitting with the President on the porch reviewing proposals for the daily agenda at the Conference. Then we see him selected as one of those sitting behind the President in the inner council chambers and to counsel with him, to whisper suggestions to him, to make his influence felt on matters of vital significance, and to supply the President with information, or misinformation, as the case might be, for making world-shattering and world-shaking decisions.

Then, Mr. President, we find Hiss the sole American representative on a committee of three, one of whom is the Communist Gromyko, preparing a report to determine how many extra votes should be given the Soviet Government in the forthcoming United Nations Charter.

Reading on in the book, Mr. President, one finds Ed Stettinius writing on page 238:

Fortunately, at this point, there was a short intermission. I asked Hiss to do a quick summary of the State Department's memorandum on the trusteeship issue. Byrnes and I talked it over with the Prime Minister, and I seemed to satisfy him when I showed him the memorandum just written by Hiss.

One of six, one of five, one of four, one of three, with Gromyko and Jebb, and then the man who writes the memorandum. This time just Mr. Hiss alone.

No wonder he can fool Dean Acheson, no wonder he can fool so many eminent Americans—suave, able, ingenious, but not smart enough to be able to cover up his tracks, so that he did not find it necessary at first to decline to admit in his own words under oath before the House Committee on Un-American Activities that he was living with a Communist spy by the name of Whittaker Chambers.

No one is going to challenge the fact that the man who wrote the memorandum alone at Yalta himself declares under oath:

When I was back in Washington, I was living with a fellow by the name of Whittaker Chambers, a Communist spy, a man I knew so well that to recognize him some years later I had to look down his throat to see if his dentures were still just the same.

Mr. President, the serious part of this is not the Alger Hiss part. The serious part is the befuddlement which has come over the world because of the miserable mess which has stemmed from Yalta. But who could expect anything else, once the record is clear?

This time without benefit of conference with Gromyko, or with Gladwyn Jebb, we find Hiss, the author of an important memorandum, about to be accepted by the Conference.

On page 270 Stettinius writes of still another incident when he says:

During one adjournment that afternoon the President asked me to get a lawyer to consult with him over the wording of the Polish boundary statement. I called Alger Hiss.

Ah, these liberal commentators, now running to cover, trying to defend themselves because they had said Alger Hiss was right and the committee was wrong. What are they going to say about the fact that the man who was called was Alger Hiss, to discuss the Polish boundary question, on which, as I have previously indicated, we first sold out a friendly ally in a victorious war and tried to buy security for ourselves, or perhaps something for the Soviets, by trading away countries which did not belong to us, and freedoms that used to belong to the Poles. These liberal commentators told us, "Hiss was at Yalta, but he did not do very much. He sort of delivered the ash trays around and collected the lead pencils."

But the man who did the work at Yalta, Ed Stettinius, by the uncontrovertible testimony of the President's friend, writing about his inability to make decisions himself at Yalta says that when the President wanted a lawyer for an important decision on Poland, "I called Alger Hiss."

Mr. President, if Alger Hiss had been a loyal as well as an able adviser to the Department of State, the important part he played over and over again in determining the decisions at Yalta would be no cause for worry or alarm. But in view of the verdict of the New York jury, coming, as it did, after the indictment of the grand jury of New York, and following his first trial, at which 8 of the 12 jurors determined Hiss was guilty, and recognizing that all of this follows the admission by Hiss, himself, before the House Committee on Un-American Activities concerning his close associations and contacts with Whittaker Chambers, who was a paid Communist agent, one shudders to contemplate the full potentiality for service to communism and to Russia and for disservice to the cause of peace and freedom which was exercised, which was planned and implemented by Alger Hiss at the Yalta Conference.

Mr. President, one rightfully wonders concerning the influence of Alger Hiss in the State Department in the formation of our policy toward China which has resulted in the disastrous collapse of autonomous China and the complete domination of that once great ally of ours by the Moscow-supported armies of communism.

In that debate, incidentally, Mr. President, I take the side of Dean Acheson, because a week ago last Friday, on the front page of the Washington Star, appeared an account of one of the most intriguing intradepartmental debates I ever read about, which took place in Washington, and was set forth in adjacent columns of the Star. That night the Star carried the report of the speech which Dean Acheson made on China at the National Press Club, where he said, and rightfully so, that China is being attacked and being controlled and being manhandled by forces of the Communists directed from Moscow, and that with Moscow leadership and assistance the Chinese Communists are separating some of the northern provinces from China for Russia. I agree with that. But his Assistant Secretary of State disagreed with him.

Dean Rusk, his assistant, was talking in Philadelphia about the same situation, and he said to the good people of the Quaker City, as reported in the parallel column of the Star, "We have got to remember that the Communist forces in China are just a group of indigenous patriots, reminding one of the American loyalists in the days of the Revolution."

That was a complete contradiction, and a complete manifestation, to me, of the utter confusion existing in our State Department toward China, when the head of the Department and his associate on the same day each refutes everything the other one says about China. Perhaps the confusions that swirled out of the Far Eastern Division when Hiss was there have made their job unduly difficult. I am not so sure.

No one can be just sure how many people in the Far Eastern Division of the State Department secured their appointments through their connection and association with Alger Hiss. There is ample demonstration from the record, however, which indicates that for many years, both prior to Yalta and since, a considerable coterie of Communist sympathizers have held influential positions in the Far Eastern Division of the State Department. For example, on November 26, 1945, in resigning his position as the President's personal representative in China, Gen. Patrick Hurley, former Secretary of War, made this statement as it is found on page 21 of the Hurley hearings:

> It is no secret that the American policy in China did not have the support of all the career men in the State Department. The professional Foreign Service men sided with the Chinese Communist armed party. * * * Our professional diplomats continuously advised the Communists that my efforts in preventing the collapse of the National government did not represent the policy of the United States.

Many will remember, although most, I am sure, have forgotten, the strange and never satisfactorily terminated Amerasia case, which, unfortunately, instead of being brought to light by a committee of Congress, which would have followed through, even when the Executive would not cooperate by giving it access to information, was handled instead by the Attorney General's office, which never pursued the clues discovered in that case to a convincing conclusion. However, 5 months after Patrick Hurley resigned and issued the statement which I have just quoted, six Government employees were arrested in the Amerasia case, on June 7, 1945.

Amerasia, it will be recalled, was a New York periodical dealing with far-eastern affairs, published by an enthusiastic popular-fronter named Phillip Jaffe. The periodical was a strong supporter of the Chinese Communist cause. There were discovered in the Amerasia office numerous papers and documents from the State Department, War Department, and other agencies, most of the papers dealing with far-eastern affairs. But following them through, as the committee did in following other papers which were found in a pumpkin, we found what happened to those who stole these papers and delivered them to a front organization in New York. Those arrested included John S. Service, Phillip Jaffe, Kate Mitchell, the coeditor of Amerasia, Mark Gayn, a journalist and contributor to the paper, Lt. Andrew Roth, a liaison officer at the State Department from Naval Intelligence, and Emmanuel S. Larsen, a civilian expert on far-eastern affairs in the Office of Naval Intelligence. These persons were charged with espionage and the possession of stolen documents. But, on August 10, 1945, it was announced that the grand jury had refused to indict Gayn, Service, and Miss Mitchell. True bills were returned, however, against Jaffe, Larsen, and Roth, charging them not with espionage but with "violation of section 88 of title 18 of the United States Code by conspiring to violate sections 100, 101, 234, and 235 of title 18, United States Code"—embezzling public property, receiving stolen public property, destroying public records, and destroying records by officer in charge.

Eventually, Jaffe pleaded guilty and was fined $2,500, which is certainly, I would say, a reasonably small fee to pay for a scoop such as that. I know many magazines that would consider the payment of $2,500 to obtain classified State Department secrets cheaper than paying reporters of their own.

Larsen pleaded nole contendere and was fined $500. The Department of Justice in both cases stated that the actions "did not involve any element of disloyalty." In other words, stealing these documents and giving them to a Communist was merely the result of a species of State Department absentmindedness; there was no disloyalty involved at all; and all that should be done was to give the ones who did it a slap on the wrist and they could then continue working for the Government.

On February 13, 1946, the Justice Department entered a nolle prosequi in the case of Roth. The disposition of the Amerasia case was done with such thoughtful consideration of the people who took or delivered the stolen documents to Amerasia that it completely failed to satisfy the American public and in 1946 a subcommittee of the House Committee on the Judiciary investigated the case in closed session. The testimony was sealed and is not now available. Finally, the Committee of the Judiciary of the House brought in a divided report in which the majority and the minority very violently disagreed about the Communist associations and contacts and loyalties of the people involved.

I mention the foregoing, Mr. President, not in an effort to reopen the Amerasia case, but to record that when it was left to one department of the executive Government to investigate another department of the executive Government the result was a glorious whitewash, incomplete, inconclusive, inadequate, and so unsatisfactory as to necessitate a congressional inquiry to try to get at the facts. I contrast that with the Alger Hiss case, which was the same kind of case, involving stolen documents. In that case the House Committee on Un-American Activities stayed with the problem of discovering why stolen documents were secreted from the State Department, and who stole them, until the culprit was brought to justice in a court of law and compelled to confess in his own words about his associations with the man to whom he gave the documents. The contrast in the methods used and the results obtained clearly justify the functions of a congressional investigating committee.

In my opinion, the colloquies we had earlier in the course of my remarks this afternoon point out that the Senate itself must assert its power to insist on securing from Government agencies every fact we need which is not detrimental to the national defense or the national security. So long as we continue to shoot fish in a barrel we will never be given a chance to shoot ducks on a duck pond. But once we insist on our rights as legislators, if we think we have rights, we then establish a two-way street that can save America. There should not be consideration merely of political advantages or the personal popularity of an individual in any office, either executive or legislative.

Getting back again, however, to the part played by Alger Hiss in the formation of our State Department policies toward China, we certainly cannot ignore the fact that the man selected by President Truman to study foreign policy in China and to prepare recommendations for him and Mr. Acheson to submit to Congress, was one Prof. Philip Jessup.

Who is Jessup? When did he get to be such a famous authority on China? I do not know about his experience or his associations with China, but he has had a tremendous backlog, apparently, of experience and association with one Alger Hiss. The man President Truman selected to come before Congress and tell us what our new foreign policy toward Asia should be apparently has found no fault with the policy up to now and seems perfectly satisfied with the consequences. But he is going to tell us what the policy should be now. What is his position in China? He is ambassador at large. Not once but twice Philip Jessup appeared in the New York criminal trial as a character witness for his friend and associate and mental mentor, Alger Hiss. I think no one can be excused from wondering a little bit about the close relationship between the convicted Communist contact man, Alger Hiss, and the man selected by President Truman to recommend a new foreign policy toward China, to follow the one which Professor Jessup apparently approved, of bringing China to its knees and Russia into control of the vast population and resources of that unhappy land. One can wonder, too, how much Alger Hiss may have influenced the thinking and the philosophy and the attitudes of Professor Jessup, whose admiration for Alger Hiss was so great that he continued to testify for him as a character witness until shortly before the time of his conviction in New York.

A second issue growing out of this tale of treachery and deception in high places and in history-shaping international conferences, Mr. President, is what is the responsibility of Congress—of this great Senate and the House of Representatives—when we find ourselves confronted as we do with the awful realization that one of the important architects of our foreign policy and our international commitments at Yalta now stands convicted of perjury by a court that heard him deny that he smuggled State Department secrets of a high-security classification out of their files and delivered them to a paid agent of Communist Russia and then concluded by its unanimous verdict of guilty that Hiss was lying under oath.

Should we be content to assume there can be no correction of the grave and grievous mistakes made at Yalta and by our do-nothing foreign policy toward China? Dare we assume that all those who were brought into positions of responsibility and importance in the State Department through their connections with Hiss and his miguided friends, mentors, and associates are now dismissed?

Clearly we do not want to punish innocent associates of Alger Hiss who were deceived by his virtuous front and his cultivated manner and who never dreamed that he was working in their midst as a confidant of Whittaker Chambers and a conveyor belt for Communists. Just as clearly, we must not blandly assume that by the arrest, conviction, and punishment of Alger Hiss we have rid the State Department of all its foreign-minded operatives or Communist sympathizers. One also wonders how greatly the past persuasive powers of Alger Hiss continue to influence the attitudes, the thinking, and the decisions of those who now make our State Department policy, and those who still say that they think Alger Hiss and his attitudes and his opinions and his behavior and his associations were appropriate and good, even though a court of the land has found them to be otherwise, and even though Hiss in his own testimony has said "Yes, I was an associate and confidant of the Communist conveyor agent, Whittaker Chambers." Surely those who think of him so highly must be motivated at least in part by the seductive suggestions this persuasive young man so willingly, so freely, and so frequently imparts.

If nothing else, these unanswered questions and the unsavory status of our foreign affairs indicate to me that when there is too much so-called bipartisanism in foreign policy the Nation suffers and our security is jeopardized. Perhaps a more alert and critical attitude by the Republican Party would have at least compelled this Democratic administration, and Presidents Roosevelt and Truman, to clean house more thoroughly and to have relied less upon attempts to ridicule disclosures as "red herring" activities or witch-hunting publicity stunts. Perhaps, too, a more vigorous and constructive criticism of State Department proposals in foreign policy would have earlier disclosed some of the flaws and futilities now so manifest for all to see in China, in Poland, in Berlin, and elsewhere around the world. Perhaps if we Republicans had insisted sooner and more ardently on a disclosure of the secret agreements made at Yalta we would have discovered much sooner that there must have been influences at work at that unfortunate conference which had other causes to serve and other motives to fulfill than a consideration of American interests and world security and integrity.

Perhaps if we Republicans had measured up a little more to our responsibility as a great minority party we could have come sooner to the rescue and it would have been easier to undo some of the dreadful damage which now so clearly is shown to have been done.

In my studied opinion, Mr. President, there are other positions for the Republican Party to take than blindly to follow or to follow too blindly the recommendations of a State Department and a Chief Executive which in the field of foreign policy have lost China to communism, which have placed our occupation forces in Berlin hemmed in by a circle of cold steel in the hands of Communist armies, which have failed completely to work out and win acceptance for an effective international protection against the fearful consequences of a possible atomic war, and which have permitted Poland to tumble from the pinnacle of victory into the abyss of slavery, while the countries of the Balkans and of central Europe have escaped a Nazi tyranny only to be turned over to an even more ruthless form of Asiatic cruelty operated by the Communist tyrants of Russia.

I suggest respectfully, Mr. President, that the alternative to a Republican "me, too" position which seems too tired or too timid to make positive, constructive, proposals of its own in the field of foreign policy, is not blind opposition to what the State Department or the President may propose. And I submit that the alternative is not isolationism. I agree with those who hold that isolationism is wrong and unworkable in our day and age. Neither is the alternative narrow nationalism, Mr. President. Despite those who would throw dust in our eyes and confuse us and keep us from thinking clearly, we Republicans do not confront the alternative of supporting unchallenged and uncriticized what we are handed by the State Department and the President or else supporting a program of isolationism or narrow nationalism which the march of time and events has proved to be unsound, unworkable, unjust, and unwise.

Between these two extremes, a great party of opposition—a vigorous minority party charged with responsibilities of constructive criticism and alternative suggestions, a party seeking to get people to vote for it and its candidates for office—has a responsibility, I think, to take those whose support it seeks into its confidence in respect to where the party stands. Therefore, I think the party of opposition, if it means business, has the responsibility of constructive criticism and alternative suggestions which, in my opinion, should find a formula for insisting that our American foreign policy be a true product of the meeting of minds among the majority of the members of both major parties, as reflected by their congressional representatives. Such a truly American product, derived from the American process of using the virtues attendant upon a biparty political system in hammering out well-considered and public-serving programs, should then merit and receive the support of all Americans, without considerations of partisanship of any kind.

To me, Mr. President, the far-flung ramifications of the Hiss conviction are sufficient in dire potentiality to merit a reappraisal, by both our major political parties, of the processes by which our foreign policies have been and are now being formulated. In my opinion, the place to seek bipartisan support for foreign policy is on its merit, before it is announced and established, rather than in suggesting to a minority party that it will be permitted to make some minor amendments to a proclaimed policy, after it has been enunciated.

A third consideration which I think flows out of this strange sequence of events, Mr. President, as I have lived with them now for 18 months, is this—and it is brought into focus by the developments in the case of Alger Hiss: Certainly and clearly, the time is here and now when this Congress without further delay or temporizing, should revise its statute of limitations so that the elapse of a short 3 years cannot buy immunity from punishment for anyone guilty of a crime against the security of his government. Such is the law which now gives basic protection to men like Alger Hiss and Henry Julian Wadleigh. We should correct that situation without delay.

A fourth condition, highlighted and emphasized by the Alger Hiss experience, is the fact that at present there is not a single law or limitation denying Communists the right to work for the Federal Government, or punishing faithless or gullible public officials who knowingly employ them.

During the Eightieth Congress, the so-called Mundt-Nixon bill was passed in the House to achieve this purpose. The vote was 319 to 56, on a recorded vote. Since the Senate failed to act, the Senator from Michigan [Mr. FERGUSON], the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. JOHNSTON], and I joined this year in introducing similar proposed legislation in the Senate. The subcommittee of the Senate Judiciary Committee considering that measure and holding hearings on it has unanimously recommended its passage to the Senate Judiciary Committee as a whole. In my opinion, this measure should be passed by the Senate without delay, so that the House will have time to act before adjournment, so as to give this country at least some protection in the law against those who would use positions of high trust in public office as operating posts from which to spy on our security provisions or to pervert our policy decisions.

Mr. President, up to now the Congress of the United States has been tremendously "long" in conversation castigating communism, but completely lame in respect to passing laws to do something about it. I hope the Judiciary Committee of the Senate will promptly report that bill and will give us a chance to vote on it, so that we shall have an opportunity to take effective action to stop this business of secreting Communists in high positions of government.

Finally, Mr. President, because of my long experience on the House Committee on Un-American Activities, dating back to service under its founder, Representative Dies, of Texas, I should like to say I think the country should recognize, as a consequence of the Alger Hiss case—which never would have seen the light of day save for that House committee—that it is imperative that a vigorous, courageous, active congressional committee, or more than one, stand guard at all times to help expose and detect those who would destroy our freedoms and our way of life by subversion and by conspiratorial treachery. It stands without contradiction, Mr. President, that had it not been for the Dies Committee on Un-American Activities, there would have been no conviction of Alger Hiss and no exposure of the espionage Communist rings operating within our Government. No one speaking for the administration can deny those facts, and an ocean full of red herring cannot obscure them.

Having served as chairman of the subcommittee handling the "pumpkin paper hearings," as they we called, Mr. President, and which resulted in the indictment and conviction of Alger Hiss, I wish to give credit where credit is due for the long, hard, thankless, and abuse-collecting effort made by those who gave up their congressional recess and their Christmases at home to come to Washington in 1948 to see this investigation through to a conclusive finish.

Mr. President, exposing the infidelity of Alger Hiss was not a one-man task. It required the best collective efforts of many minds and talents, and the stout-hearted ability to overcome heartbreaking obstacles and malicious criticisms from persons in high positions. It required patience to persist when the result seemed shrouded in contradictions and confusion, and it called for the united determination of many men dedicated to getting at the truth and to following the trails wherever they might lead, whether to obscure little men in out-of-the-way places—whom everyone is always ready to find guilty—or to men in high and respected positions of trust who were placed there by the administrations of President Roosevelt and President Truman, whom persons in the executive agencies understandably dislike to have found guilty.

High on the list of those entitled to an accolade from the public for his work in this case is Representative RICHARD M. NIXON, of the Twelfth District of California. Mr. NIXON brought to the committee his great talents as a lawyer, combined with a devotion to the principles of fair play, and a bulldog, Churchillian determination which never takes "no" for an answer and never stops following a trail until it reaches its end. By his brilliant decision to serve a new subpena upon Whittaker Chambers at the propitious time, Mr. NIXON brought to the committee room the documentary evidence from the microfilms found in the pumpkin, evidence which eventually played such an important part in the conviction of Alger Hiss. His interrogations of the witnesses were firm, fair, and fact-procuring.

With him on the Republican side of the committee was Representative John McDowell, of Wilkinsburg, Pa., whose persistence equaled that of any member of our group, and whose ingenuity and industry in asking searching questions produced many helpful answers essential to building the great body of evidence in this case. Another Republican Representative, Richard Vail, of Chicago, Ill., although hampered by illness, jeopardized his recovery from an operation to attend the hearings and to participate in the inquiry. His penetrating questioning aided greatly in developing some of the inaccuracies and inconsistencies in the long testimony of Alger Hiss.

Mr. President, let it be recorded here, in what may be the only place in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD where future historians can find the full, detailed account of this strange case, that the Democrats on our subcommittee served with patience, courage, and patriotism equal to that of the Republicans I have enumerated.

Representative JOHN E. RANKIN, of Mississippi, and Representative F. EDWARD HÉBERT, of Lousiana, were always in committee attendance, and their zeal for getting at the ultimate truths involved was no less than that of any of their Republican colleagues. Both Mr. RANKIN and Mr. HÉBERT hewed to the line and devoted time, study, and effort to the case to a degree well reflected in the productive suggestions they proposed and the intelligent and effective nature of their questions.

Be it said to their eternal credit, Mr. President, that these two Democratic Representatives in Congress pulled no punches and sought no easy outs for Alger Hiss when it became apparent from the evidence that he was lying to our committee and that he was confessing to associations with the Communist Chambers that in themselves marked Hiss as unfit for the high offices he held. Representative RANKIN and Representative HÉBERT repeatedly placed patriotism above party during these long hearings and throughout the tedious, time-consuming investigation. All of us frequently disagreed about methods and motives as the work wore on but they were never differences along partisan lines nor disputes for political advantage. The arguments were always as to what tactic or what course would best take us to the hard core of truth in the case. Every report issued by our subcommittee was unanimous.

Finally, Mr. President, the results of the Hiss case crowned the long anti-communistic efforts of a great American and a great Texan, Robert E. Stripling, chief investigator of the committee throughout the case, and, except for his war service, throughout the history of the committee from the time another great Texan, Martin Dies, created the committee until the end of the Eightieth Congress.

The investigative genius and the stupendous knowledge of Communist tactics and methods brought to bear by Bob Stripling contributed mightily to the successful conclusion of this case. Stripling is now out of Government service, but America owes him much for his great work in helping to expose and curtail the activities of Communists throughout our land. The entire staff of associate investigators, many of them still with the committee, and the employees of the committee who worked nights, Saturdays, and Sundays so that the limited personnel available to the committee might bring this case to an intelligible and factual conclusion should share in the credit awarded by those who are grateful that for every American public official or Government employee who is faithless and disloyal there are more than half a hundred who are hard-working, patriotic, and devoted to their duties. Special mention should be made of the good work done by Ben Mandel of our committee staff.

I want to say that the FBI, operating under the tremendous handicaps of an official attitude on the part of the executive agencies, restraining it from cooperating with our committee openly, did cooperate to the full extent that it was permitted under the circumstances, in helping to bring to a correct conclusion one of the most disturbing cases in our American history. Incidentally, I should like also to say a special word in tribute to attorney Tom Murphy of the Department of Justice, for the excellent work done by him in both trials.

As for me, Mr. President, I am simply grateful that the long case is concluded and that my transfer to the Senate has relieved me of the arduous, distasteful, although at times highly interesting, duties attendant upon membership on a committee charged with disclosing and curtailing subversive activities in these United States. Heading this committee assignment was the hardest, most difficult task I ever had in Congress.

History will write the ultimate verdict on the significance of the disclosures revealed by the so-called Hiss-Chambers investigation and hearings. Alger Hiss has been convicted in a fair and dispassionate trial. He has been sentenced to serve 5 years in the Federal penitentiary. Henry Julian Wadleigh and Whittaker Chambers have both confessed to the parts they played in this Communist conspiracy. Others accused by Chambers were driven from Government by confessions, by their inability to deny the charges without risk of perjury trials, or by departure from the country so no longer are a threat to our internal security.

It may well be that in the retrospect of history the Alger Hiss case will rank of greater importance than the Teapot Dome scandals of an earlier era. In the Teapot Dome case men were found guilty of faithlessness in public office in the protection of the public purse. They placed private profit above public service. In the case of Alger Hiss and Julian Wadleigh and others of their group, men were found guilty of faithlessness in public office in the protection and safeguarding of their country's national security and traditional freedoms. They placed faith in a foreign creed above devotion to the principles, the purposes, and the people of America.

Out of this whole unsavory and sordid experience, Mr. President, let us hope we can have a rallying of the patriotic and sound-thinking forces of the free people of our great Republic. The time is fast approaching when the people of America who cherish their political freedoms and their rights of private enterprise and individual initiative must close ranks and work together if we are to defeat the plans and programs of those who would centralize all authority in the hands of a few men to be administered autocratically according to the formula of communism or of nazism or of some form of national socialism whereby either misguided Americans with love for power or aggressive foreigners with alien creeds become the masters of our common destiny.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to insert at this point in the RECORD certain printed material dealing with various aspects of the subject I have been discussing. The first is an editorial from the Daily Argus Leader, Sioux Falls, S. Dak., entitled, "That 'Red Herring' Becomes a Whale." It was published on January 23, 1950, by the leading newspaper in five States, in the South Dakota area, and I think is of pertinent information to the Senate.

The second is an editorial published in the Chicago Daily Tribune of Friday, December 30, 1949, entitled, "All Traveling in the Same Direction," which I insert primarily to point out that at least everyone outside the Committee on Un-American Activities was not fooled about the true implications of the Hiss trial, back as far as December 30, 1949, at any rate, while the trial was still in progress.

Finally, I have prepared, at the request of Members of the Senate, to supplement the summation I have already placed in the RECORD, in the form of a chronology, a summary of some of the disclosures in the Chambers-Hiss case following the August 1948 hearings, which I am placing in the RECORD with complete documentation as to their sources in the public reports and the hearings of the committee. I ask unanimous consent to put this in the RECORD, because I have had numerous requests from colleagues in the Senate and from the constituents of Senators. Copies of hearings and copies of reports have all been exhausted, and none are available. I have tried to get the pertinent points together in this way for the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the editorials and the summary were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Daily Argus Leader, Sioux Falls, S. Dak., of January 23, 1950]

THAT RED HERRING BECOMES A WHALE

It was, to quote President Truman, "just a red herring." But that was a year or so ago.

But the whole Alger Hiss case became something else officially late Saturday when a Federal court held that the former high representative of the Department of State was guilty of the charges brought against him.

No longer is this matter just a red herring. It is an astounding revelation of perfidy, espionage, and abuse of public trust.

Hiss wasn't just a routine clerk in the Department of State. He was one of its most important functionaries. He had access to the department's top secrets. He dominated the secretariat of the formative meeting of the United Nations Organization in San Francisco. He was President Roosevelt's right-hand man at the epochal conference at Yalta with Stalin.

RED INFILTRATION

Technically Hiss was convicted of perjury. Actually he stands before the Nation as a man who has been exposed as a traitor to his Nation.

The pattern of odd events in the hectic days immediately preceding the war and during it becomes clearer in consequence. Thoughtful observers saw in many Washington transactions an inspiration that seemed more concerned with the advancement of Russia than that of the United States.

Hiss fooled many, among whom was President Roosevelt. He fooled the trustees of the Carnegie Endowment for International Peace. He made dupes of many Washington columnists.

But he did not fool the House Un-American Activities Committee. It was this committee that persistently and vigorously pushed the investigation that resulted in the development of the charges against Hiss. The committee worked toward its objective despite the fact that one of the worst smear campaigns in American history was directed against it.

MUNDT'S GOOD WORK

And South Dakotans may well be proud to realize that a man from their State—Representative KARL MUNDT—took the leadership on the committee to expose Hiss. If it hadn't been for MUNDT'S determined work, the probabilities are that the nefarious activities of Hiss would not have been exposed.

While the investigation was under way, the committee as a whole, and particularly MUNDT, were subjected to terrific abuse. Even the President of the United States participated in the campaign to belittle the probe. Subtly vicious charges were brought against the committee in an attempt to discredit it. Looking backward, it now appears to be quite reasonable to assume that some of this criticism was Communist-inspired. Much was said about the noble character of Hiss and how the committee was assassinating his character and trampling his honor in the dust.

OTHER QUESTIONS ARISE

Now the Hiss phase of the story has been told. But, Americans may wonder, what else remains untold. Was Hiss the only darling of the Russians who held a high Government office? How many others were there then? How many—the most important question—are there in high office now?

It seemed—and was—easy for men with extreme liberal and pinkish trends of thought to enter Federal office during the New Deal. They were welcomed and promoted. Some of them, to be sure, were good Americans but more than a few, it appears obvious, were unduly friendly toward Russia.

Now that Hiss has been convicted and that even President Truman himself is probably ready to say that it's something more than "just a red herring," perhaps we can hope that an active campaign will be instituted to ferret out other Red emissaries in the Capital.

[From the Chicago Daily Tribune of December 30, 1949]

ALL TRAVELING IN THE SAME DIRECTION

The cross-examination of Alger Hiss brought out an extraordinary story of interlocking relationships which inescapably reminds one of what Lincoln had to say on the subject of framed timbers before the Republican State convention at Springfield in 1858. It is the contention of Mr. Hiss that he was never a Communist, never spied for Russia, and never sympathized with communism. Why, then, by his own testimony, did he invariably find himself mixed up with people who were these things and did these things?

Mr. Hiss concedes that in the prewar days in the State Department, when he is accused of having abstracted secret documents for a Soviet espionage ring, he knew his accuser, Whittaker Chambers, who admits he was a Communist who carried the papers to Soviet agents. But Mr. Hiss says that he didn't know Chambers by that name, but as one George Crosley. He didn't know him as a fellow Communist, Mr. Hiss continues, but as a free-lance writer.

Mr. Hiss says that he was so far from being on intimate terms with "Crosley" that he had difficulty recognizing him some years later when his accuser confronted him. Yet he gave him his Washington apartment rent free, paid his utility bills, gave him his automobile, paid the insurance on it, lent him money, and accepted in return a valuable oriental rug as a present.

This in itself would be a strange story. The story, as it unfolds, is a good deal stranger. There was, in the State Department, a contemporary of Mr. Hiss named Noel Field, who left for Europe on other business in 1936, a year or two before Mr. Chambers says that Mr. Hiss began purloining official secret papers for Russian espionage. Mrs. Hede Massing, an admitted former Communist agent, who also was a witness against Mr. Hiss, stated that he and she wrangled over which was to have Mr. Field's underground services when he was still in Washington as a member of the Communist Party. Mr. Hiss also denies this.

Yet Mr. Hiss admitted under cross-examination that some years later, when Mr. Field, still in Europe, was on his uppers, a request was received from him asking help. Mr. Field addressed this to his friend, Laurence Duggan, president of the Institute of International Education, a Carnegie agency, suggesting that Duggan might induce Hiss to accept some reports on eastern European affairs.

Mr. Hiss had by this time graduated to the presidency of the Carnegie Endowment for International Peace, and Mr. Field thought that organization might be interested in his writings. In reply Mr. Hiss wrote a "Dear Noel" letter to Mr. Field, explaining that the Carnegie group did not hire reporters, but stating that he had spoken in Mr. Field's behalf to Frieda Kirchwey, editor of the left-wing weekly, the Nation. He also suggested that Mr. Field try Michael Straight, editor of the New Republic, another periodical cut to the same jib.

Mr. Hiss also thought that Mr. Field could lose nothing by trying to place his stuff with Harpers magazine, which, at the least, reflects the New Deal national Socialist viewpoint these days, and he also proposed a flier with United Nations World.

None of the participants in this chummy correspondence club fared very well. Mr. Duggan, 5 days after the indictment of Mr. Hiss, and shortly after he had heard that he, too, had been mentioned in the investigation of Mr. Chambers' charges, plunged 16 floors to his death from the window of his New York office. The distance of his body from the building wall seemed to exclude accident, suggesting that he had been launched from the window with considerable initial momentum, but incurious official inquiry never established whether it was murder or suicide.

Mr. Field, charged by various renegade Communists with having been a Soviet spy in the United States, later was charged during spy trials in Hungary with having afterward been an American espionage agent against the Soviet Union and its satellites. In any event, he vanished last May in Czechoslovakia, now one of Stalin's kept countries, and when his brother and sister-in-law went looking for him behind the iron curtain they disappeared, too.

This network of Communists, left wingers, and persons of dubious associations and loyalties were friends of Mr. Hiss by conscious selection and he was most familiar with publications of the same orientation. When he says he did not share their outlook or join in their activities, he must answer to Lincoln's charge that, though preconcert cannot absolutely be known, when timbers are joined by different hands at different times and places, and fit exactly together, "we find it impossible not to believe that * * * all understood one another from the beginning, and all worked upon a common plan or draft, drawn up before the first blow was struck."

[From second report of Committee on Un-American Activities on Soviet espionage within the United States Government, December 31, 1948]

SUMMARY OF 1948 DISCLOSURES IN CHAMBERS-HISS CASE FOLLOWING AUGUST 1948 HEARINGS

RECENT DISCLOSURES

Subsequent to the public confrontation before this committee, Chambers repeated his charges against Alger Hiss in a radio program in response to a challenge by Hiss to do so. Thirty days later, Alger Hiss brought suit against Whittaker Chambers in Federal court in Baltimore, Md., charging libel and slander. On November 17, pretrial depositions were being taken by the attorneys for Mr. Hiss, and during the examination of Chambers he was asked, in substance, whether he had any documentary material to support his allegations.

Thereupon Chambers submitted a number of typewritten documents which he said Hiss had given him. Chambers said these documents had been copied from State Department records, most of which were very confidential and classified as restricted to high Government officials for use and knowledge.

Alexander Campbell, head of the Criminal Division of the Department of Justice, was called in immediately, and the material was turned over to him. The various participants in the deposition were directed, in the interest of national security, to keep silent on the whole matter. On December 1, 1948, there appeared in a Washington newspaper an item to the effect that new and sensational information had been submitted in the Hiss-Chambers controversy. Later the same day, the United Press stated:

"[From the Washington Daily News of December 1, 1948]

"HISS AND CHAMBERS PERJURY PROBE HITS DEAD END

"The Justice Department is about ready to drop its investigation of the celebrated Alger Hiss-Whittaker Chambers controversy, it was learned today.

"Department officials still have under study the question of a possible perjury prosecution. But officials said privately that unless additional evidence is forthcoming, they are inclined to forget the whole thing.

"The perjury question arose when Mr. Chambers, an admitted ex-Communist who is now with Time magazine, charged under oath that Mr. Hiss was a member of a pre-war Communist underground in official Washington. Mr. Hiss, a former State Department official, denied it—also under oath.

"Their conflicting statements were made during House Un-American Activities Committee's hearings last summer on Communists in the Government. The committee turned their testimony over to the Justice Department for a perjury investigation.

"One Department source said that on the basis of available evidence, officials in charge of the case believe it would be unwise to take it before a grand jury. But he emphasized this attitude could change overnight if the House committee or the Department investigators dig up some new evidence.

"The FBI has taken part in the Department's investigation. Attorney General Tom C. Clark has assigned the case to Special Assistant John Ford Baecher and United States Attorney George Morris Fay."

The suggestion of the United Press story greatly disturbed members of the committee who had, all this time, continued to press their own investigation. On the same day Representative RICHARD NIXON and the chief investigator to the committee, Robert E. Stripling, proceeded to Westminster, Md., to question Mr. Chambers, and to obtain, if possible, any evidence in his possession which related to espionage or other illegal activities. Mr. Chambers, when questioned by Mr. NIXON, stated that he had been informed he would be in contempt of court if he discussed what he had submitted at Baltimore, at the pretrial hearing.

Chambers did not tell Mr. NIXON what evidence he had submitted at the pretrial examination except that he indicated it was highly important. That night when the chief investigator and Mr. NIXON returned to Washington, representatives of the FBI were immediately informed of the conversation.

The following morning, upon instructions of the committee, a subpena was issued for Chambers calling upon him to produce all documents or material in his possession dealing with this case. While this was not the first subpena served upon Chambers by the committee, it was the first subpena calling for documents.

It should also be remembered that no other Government agency had ever before issued a subpena upon Chambers calling for documents, though he had, in September, been summoned to New York before a special Federal grand jury on espionage as a result of the disclosures he had made in his first public hearings by this committee. When he received the committee subpena for papers on December 2, Chambers said he was prepared to turn over all information in his possession, and thereupon he was accompanied by Committee Investigators Wheeler and Appell to his home in Westminster, Md., where he produced the five rolls of microfilm.

Three rolls were encased in a lightproof metal cylinder sealed with tape. However, one of the cylinders had been mashed or opened previously, and Chambers informed the investigators at the time of handing them over that he felt sure that this roll had been light-struck and would be worthless. These three rolls of film, he informed the committee agents, were undeveloped. The other two rolls had been developed and were wrapped in oilpaper.

The two agents marked and identified the developed film and unopened containers and returned to Washington, arriving about midnight. Investigator Appell locked the film in his bureau in his home and brought it in to the committee offices at 9:15 the following morning. It was submitted to the chief investigator, who examined the developed film through an enlarging equipment and determined that secret and confidential documents of the State Department were pictured thereon.

He then instructed Mr. Wheeler to proceed with the developed film to the laboratory of a photographic technician in the Treasury Department, for the purpose of taking enlarged pictures.

Mr. Appell, upon instructions, proceeded to the photographic laboratory of the Veterans' Administration with the undeveloped film and preserved the evidence in full.

The committee wishes to emphasize that this film received expert technical attention from the time it was received by the committee from Mr. Chambers to the present time, and that none was destroyed or light-struck after it was surrendered to the committee.

IMPORTANCE OF THE EVIDENCE

State Department officials have testified before the committee that publication of some of these documents even today, more than 10 years after they were originally written, would endanger the national security.

An indication of the wide diversity of the subjects covered, and the confidential character of the messages involved, can be obtained by referring to the appendix of this volume, in which are reproduced those documents which have been approved for release by the State Department.

Perhaps the most significant and disturbing feature is the fact that Messrs. Sumner Welles, John Peurifoy, and Francis B. Sayre, present or past high State Department officers, all agree that with documents of this type in their possession, agents of foreign governments would be able to break the most secret diplomatic codes of the United States.

Following is an excerpt from the testimony of Mr. Sayre:

"Mr. NIXON. Mr. Sayre, in this connection I have been somewhat interested in comments of some columnists and, in fact, one case attributed to an anonymous source in the State Department—I say 'anonymous' because the official sources have spoken completely to the contrary on this point—to the effect that the information contained in these documents wasn't important anyway and it didn't make much difference if the Russians did get it or anything else.

"Do you agree there was nothing important or nothing wrong with turning this stuff over?

"Mr. SAYRE. I violently disagree, not only because of substance of these cables, but because some of them were in the highly confidential codes.

"Now, some of those codes—for instance, the Gray code, so-called—I suspect that other governments had that, but they didn't have these highly confidential codes; and for these telegrams to get out at the time they did meant that other governments could crack our codes, and that, I think, is indescribably horrible.

"Mr. NIXON. In other words, it is not only a question of this information, but it is the question of the potential information which they might have obtained?

"Mr. SAYRE. By cracking the code, which gives them the run of the whole thing."

This, in fact, means that not only did the government which received these identified documents have access to the information available in them, but that they, without question, also had complete access to all of the secret and confidential messages transmitted by the State Department during the period involved, through knowledge of the code system. Since this was in the general historical era of the Stalin-Hitler pact, it is also likely that Nazi Germany and subseqently Japan may have known our State Department secret codes and communications, before and during the war.

It should also be kept in mind that the documents which Mr. Chambers turned over to the committee, and in the pretrial hearing, constitute only 1 week's supply of information and a very small proportion of the total volume which Chambers had transmitted to the Soviet Union prior to the time he decided to break with the Communist Party.

Chambers' testimony is that he first started to microfilm documents and transmit them to the Soviet Union in the early part of 1935, and that the operation had continued weekly until April 1938.

If the documents which have been released by the committee, only 1 week's fraction of the total volume which Chambers had obtained and transmitted to the Soviet agents, were the only documents which reached the Soviet Union, the committee would consider the effect on United States security serious enough.

However the testimony of Whittaker Chambers is that during the 2 years previous to the receipt of this particular batch of documents, he had been running a veritable espionage production line out of the State Department and other departments of the Government, the output of which was being funneled to Moscow by way of a skillfully run transmission belt.

HOW CHAMBERS GOT THE DOCUMENTS

Chambers testified that he had two sources of information in the State Department. His principal source, from which he obtained most of the strictly confidential documents, operated in the following manner:

The source would bring the documents out in a brief case and take them home. There, Chambers would take over the brief case and go on to meet a photographic expert at a prearranged place. The expert would take the brief case and documents to a laboratory in Baltimore, put the documents on film, and would return the brief case and contents to Chambers the same night.

Sometimes Chambers stated it would be as late as 1 in the morning before he got the brief case back. He would then proceed to the home of his source, deliver the brief case, and the documents would be returned to the State Department files.

Chambers would then pick up the microfilm in Baltimore; place them in a tobacco pouch, and carry them to New York, where he would deliver them to a Colonel Bykov, of the Soviet espionage system, who was at that time known to Chambers only as Peters.

Because the committee does not wish to hamper the prosecution of cases under the jurisdiction of the Department of Justice, we are not making reference at this point to the names of the people whom Chambers has given as coconspirators in this criminal activity.

As far as the committee has been able to determine, Colonel Bykov had no official position in this country and was an illegally present alien spy.

The committee has taken the detailed testimony in as many aspects of this case as possible without interfering with the grand jury. It has before it evidence of the manner in which Colonel Bykov approached the sources of information within the Government and arranged, in cooperation with Chambers, for the furnishing of this information which Chambers swears was sent to the Soviet Union.

The leaders of the Russian underground in this country caused to be delivered to four high sources in the Federal Government, who had been unusually productive, expensive Russian Bokhara rugs, in appreciation for their unusual service to the Soviet Union. The committee at this time is withholding the names of the recipients and the interrogating details in order not to interfere in the present investigation of the Federal grand jury on espionage now convened in New York City.

However, at the proper time, we intend to make full disclosure, not only of this rug deal, but all matters of evidence, with specific details, as to one of the most serious espionage cases in United States history.

Chambers testified that between 1932 and 1938 he obtained documents from the State Department, the Bureau of Standards, the Aberdeen Proving Ground, and certain information from the Navy; also that the same ring with which he worked got vital information from key United States industries. The documents pictured on the microfilm, which had been developed at the time we secured them from Chambers, were highly confidential and classified documents from the Department of State, the most important of which came from the office of Assistant Secretary of State Francis B. Sayre.

These documents bore the official stamp of Mr. Sayre and have been identified by him as having been taken from his office. Four people had access to these documents once they arrived at Mr. Sayre's office, namely: Francis B. Sayre; Alger Hiss, his first assistant; Eunice Lincoln, his administrative assistant, and Anna Belle Newcomb, secretary and stenographer for the office.

The committee had before it Mr. Sayre, Miss Lincoln, and Miss Newcomb; all emphatically denied under oath that they had ever turned any documents over to any unauthorized person.

The microfilmed documents in question, which were secret and confidential for the Secretary of State only and which were sent in the highest code, were delivered to Mr. Sayre's office from the code room of the State Department in a black metal box. When this box arrived at Mr. Sayre's office, it was opened by Miss Lincoln with a key provided for the office by the code room for that purpose only.

When Mr. Sayre's office had finished studying the documents, which sometimes took several days, the documents were placed back in the black box, locked by Miss Lincoln, and returned to the code room by code-room messengers, where, with duplicate key, the box was reopened and the contents filed in the code room's guarded record office.

The testimony of Mr. Sayre and Miss Lincoln brought out that it was a practice for both Mr. Sayre and Mr. Hiss to take documents in their brief case from the Department of State at night to their homes for study. Miss Newcomb and Miss Lincoln both testified that they had never taken any documents themselves from the State Department.

When Miss Lincoln and Miss Newcomb were shown photostatic copies of the typewritten and handwritten documents which were submitted by Whittaker Chambers at the pretrial examination in Baltimore, both testified that these documents were not typed in the State Department and that the character and form of the documents were such that they could not have been prepared for the purpose of transmitting information in the regular course of State Department business.

Mr. Sayre testified that the handwritten memos had not been prepared by Mr. Hiss for him or under his instruction. Mr. Sayre also testified that he could see no reason why the typewritten documents could or would have been prepared in the regular course of State Department business. He denied that these typed or handwritten documents were brought to his attention.

The committee is satisfied, as a result of the technical investigation and determinations which have been made by typewriter experts, that it has been conclusively established where and on what machine these documents were typed.

In addition to the typewritten documents submitted at the pretrial examination in Baltimore, and in addition to the microfilms which Mr. Chambers submitted to the committee, Mr. Chambers also produced, at the pretrial examination, three documents written in the hand of Alger Hiss, the text of which appear in the appendix of this report.

When these documents were shown to Miss Newcomb, she testified that they were not of the type which Mr. Hiss would prepare in connection with the regular duties he performed in the office of Mr. Sayre.

Mr. Chambers also testified that he received and transmitted to Russian agents information concerning a new self-sealing aviation tank developed by the Navy, the metallurgical formula dealing with the Norden bombsight, and the lists of foreign intelligence agents and naval intelligence reports.

WEDNESDAY, JANUARY 25, 1950

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

Rev. Francis Przybylski, Wausau, Wis., offered the following prayer:

Almighty and eternal God, father, and protector of mankind, author and defender of justice and love, look down with favor upon the Members of the House of Representatives of this great country this day.

Mindful of Your blessings on our Nation and on us, we thank You, Lord. Today, in these trying times, when so often justice and love of man are clouded by misunderstanding and other considerations, give us the wisdom, in the problems that confront us, to understand what is right; to judge with justice tempered with charity. Give us the courage to do what is just for our Nation and other nations, and to speak for it with eloquence, that peace may reign within nations and among nations.

In the words of St. Francis—

Lord, make me an instrument of Your peace.

Where there is hatred, let me sow love; where there is injury, pardon; where there is doubt, faith; where there is despair, hope; where there is darkness, light; and where there is sickness, joy.

Oh, Divine Master, grant that I may not so much seek to be consoled as to console; to be understood as to understand; to be loved as to love.

This we ask in the name of the Father who created us, the Son who redeemed us, and the Holy Spirit who inspires and sanctifies us. Amen.

CALL OF THE HOUSE

Mr. DAVIS of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that a quorum is not present.

The SPEAKER (after counting). Evidently there is no quorum present.

Mr. PRIEST. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

A call of the House was ordered.

The Clerk called the roll, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

The SPEAKER. On this roll call 367 Members have answered to their names, a quorum.

By unanimous consent, further proceedings under the call were dispensed with.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT

A message in writing from the President of the United States was communicated to the House by Mr. Miller, one of his secretaries.

HON. PAUL BROWN, MEMBER OF CONGRESS

Mr. CAMP. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CAMP]?

There was no objection.

Mr. CAMP. Mr. Speaker, I wish to call attention to the roll call which has just ensued, in which, for the first time in 17 years, my colleague the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BROWN] failed to answer to his name.

The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BROWN] is sick. I am glad to report to the House, however, that he had a very restful night and is improved.

I believe his is one of the most remarkable records of promptness, diligence, and fidelity to duty ever made in this House. I think this House will appreciate it and will be glad to know that the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BROWN] is recovering and will soon be back at his post of duty.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CAMP. I yield.

Mr. RANKIN. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BROWN] was the first Member of Congress to answer every roll call for more than 10 consecutive years.

I was the first man in Congress to answer every roll call for 10 consecutive years. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BROWN] has exceeded my record.

When the late Speaker Champ Clark wrote his book, no man had answered every roll call for more than seven consecutive years. I came to Congress about the time that book was published.

So the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BROWN] has by far the best record, from that standpoint, of any man who has ever served in the Congress of the United States.

Mr. CAMP. He has been a Member of Congress since July 5, 1933.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CAMP] has expired.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. BREHM. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD and include a dental-health program proposed by the American Dental Association.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio?

Mr. MARCANTONIO. Mr. Speaker, a point of order. I am constrained to object to the transaction of any other business except the call of the committee at this time, since this is Calendar Wednesday. After the committees have been called, I will not object.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman object to extension of remarks and 1-minute speeches by anybody?

Mr. MARCANTONIO. At this time, Mr. Speaker, until the committees are called.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES—NATIONAL CAPITAL HOUSING AUTHORITY (H. DOC. NO. 455)

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States, which was read by the Clerk and, together with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia:

To the Congress of the United States:

In accordance with the provisions of section 5 (a) of the District of Columbia Alley Dwelling Act, approved June 12, 1934, I transmit herewith for the information of the Congress the report of the National Capital Housing Authority for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1949.

HARRY S. TRUMAN.

THE WHITE HOUSE, January 25, 1950.

AMENDMENT OF BANKRUPTCY ACT

Mr. SABATH, from the Committee on Rules, reported the following privileged resolution (H. Res. 441) providing for the consideration of the bill (S. 88) to amend section 60 of the act entitled "An act to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States," approved July 1, 1898, as amended (Rept. No. 1523), which was referred to the House Calendar and ordered to be printed:

Resolved, That immediately upon the adoption of this resolution it shall be in order to move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union for the consideration of the bill (S. 88) to amend section 60 of the act entitled "An act to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States," approved July 1, 1898, as amended. That after general debate, which shall be confined to the bill and continue not to exceed 1 hour, to be equally divided and controlled by the chairman and ranking minority member of the Committee on the Judiciary, the bill shall be read for amendment under the 5-minute rule. At the conclusion of the consideration of the bill for amendment, the Committee shall rise and report the bill to the House with such amendments as may have been adopted and the previous question shall be considered as ordered on the bill and amendments thereto to final passage without intervening motion except one motion to recommit.

MOTION TO ADJOURN

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The question was taken.

The motion was rejected.

CALENDAR WEDNESDAY

The SPEAKER. This is Calendar Wednesday. The Clerk will call the committees.

Mr. DAVIS of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, I move to dispense with further proceedings under the Calendar Wednesday rule.

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. McCORMACK. This motion in order to succeed must receive a two-thirds vote, if I remember the rules correctly.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is correct.

The question was taken.

Mr. DAVIS of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were refused.

The SPEAKER. In the opinion of the Chair, two-thirds not having voted in favor thereof, the motion is lost.

The Clerk will call the committees.

TERMINAL-LEAVE PAY

Mr. KILDAY (when the Committee on Armed Services was called). Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on Armed Services, I call up the bill (H. R. 3205) to provide a 1-year extension of the time for making application for terminal-leave pay.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. This bill appears on the Union Calendar and under the rule the House automatically resolves itself into the Committee of the Whole.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 3205) to provide a 1-year extension of the time for making application for terminal-leave pay, with Mr. HARRIS in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

By unanimous consent, the first reading of the bill was dispensed with.

The CHAIRMAN. Under the rule, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. KILDAY] is entitled to 1 hour and the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. ELSTON] is entitled to 1 hour.

Mr. KILDAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MARTIN].

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, may I inquire of the majority leader what is going to be called up on tomorrow?

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Chairman, House Joint Resolution 371 out of the Ways and Means Committee, a bill I referred to yesterday, will be called up. I could not give definite information to the House on yesterday, but I can say now that that resolution will come up for consideration on tomorrow. It is a bill relating to the retroactive taxes on life-insurance companies for 1948 and 1949.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Is that bill going to be brought up under an open rule?

Mr. McCORMACK. Yes. May I advise the gentleman from Massachusetts and the House that it is not a rule; it is a privileged matter but under the rules of the House it will be open to amendment.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. The gentleman does not know about Friday?

Mr. McCORMACK. That will depend on what the Rules Committee does tomorrow on the cotton acreage quota bill. If that committee reports out a rule the probabilities are it will come up on Friday. Again I would like to leave a slight qualification there.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Have any arrangements been made for Saturday?

Mr. McCORMACK. No; there is nothing for Saturday. I hope we can adjourn over.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. I yield to the gentleman from Mississippi.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Chairman, I wish to announce to the House that Hiss got 5 years in the penitentiary for perjury.

Mr. KILDAY. Mr. Chairman, I now yield myself such time as I may desire to use.

Mr. Chairman, the bill (H. R. 3205) has been reported to the House by the Committee on Armed Services and provides for an extension of time for making application for terminal-leave pay. This bill was offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. PHILBIN]. He would have fixed the termination date as September 1, 1949.

It will be recalled that at the time the bill authorizing payment of terminal-leave bonds was passed it provided that applications for payment of terminal leave had to be filed prior to September 1, 1947.

Thereafter, when the law was amended permitting these bonds to be cashed, the application date was extended to September 1, 1948.

Therefore, since 1948 it has not been possible for anyone to apply for his terminal-leave pay. It has developed that the Army, the Navy, the Marine Corps, and the Coast Guard have rejected 16,303 claims which were filed after September 1, 1948. It will be necessary for these applications to be resubmitted to the Departments concerned, along with other applications by persons entitled to payment who have not heretofore filed for such pay.

The situation is this: Those who very promptly sought to take advantage of the terminal-leave law received their pay. However, there were those who might, at that time, have been in such financial condition that they did not feel that they wanted to take advantage of the law; others were misinformed as to the necessity for applying, and some few upon discharge were misinformed as to the method for applying. We are in the situation that those who very promptly sought to take advantage have received the benefits of this law, and those who may have delayed because they originally did not intend to take advantage of it have since found, because of personal circumstances, that it is necessary to do so and now are not permitted to accept it.

I want to point out that funds were appropriated when this law became effective for the purpose of paying all of the terminal-leave pay. At the present time it is believed that it will not be necessary to make any additional appropriations for the payment of the terminal-leave pay. However, it will be necessary to make a small appropriation of $69,000 to be used in the administration of this measure.

The committee amended the bill as originally offered, which had provided for its termination on September 1, 1949. We have provided for a termination date of June 30, 1951, and we have selected June 30, 1951, in order to have the termination date coincide with the termination of the fiscal year so that the Departments will be able to calculate with some accuracy what the administrative expense is going to be. This will permit the Departments to terminate the activities of these administrative departments at the end of that fiscal year. We believe this date will be greatly to the advantage of economy in the costs of administration.

It is the view of the committee that there should be no further extension of the termination date of this act. It has been previously extended. We believe that adequate publicity should be given that this extension is to be the last extension, and that those who are entitled to apply for terminal-leave pay under the provisions of this proposed law must act diligently or they will not be entitled to any other chance to secure payment of their terminal leave.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KILDAY. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. JAVITS. I would like to inform the gentleman that I have a case of a man who was in the Government service out of the country, and for that reason was in no position to file his claim. He did not know about it.

Mr. KILDAY. That is correct. There are a number of cases of people who did not have such an opportunity.

Mr. JAVITS. I am very glad to see this bill brought up.

Mr. KILDAY. It has been pointed out in connection with this bill that the original Terminal Leave Pay Act came out on a discharge petition. As a result it never had that careful committee consideration that a bill should have, and these matters could not have been considered or foreseen at that time. The committee was discharged from its consideration before it held any hearings on it, so that that must be borne in mind. It could not be expected to be in such perfect condition as if it had orderly committee consideration.

Mr. KEEFE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KILDAY. I yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. KEEFE. Is it correct to say that the purpose of this bill is to give simple justice to those who for one reason or another may have failed to file application for terminal leave?

Mr. KILDAY. The gentleman is correct. You could not justify a terminal-leave pay provision on any ground other than that it was something the men had earned and to which they were entitled. The committee feels that if there were various circumstances that made it impossible or impracticable for the men to apply they ought not to be now cut off from receiving payment of that which they earned and to which they are entitled, but we do feel that there must be a termination to the program and that no further extensions should be considered after this law is enacted.

Mr. ELSTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HOFFMAN].

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, so that I may understand the gentleman who just left the floor, may I ask, so that I may be sure of my understanding, if this bill goes through will that on the day named end the opportunity to take terminal leave?

Mr. KILDAY. I do not exactly understand the question. Does the gentleman mean that it is intended that that will terminate the right to apply for leave that has heretofore accumulated?

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Yes.

Mr. KILDAY. That is the idea of the committee, that it should be done that way. We realize that we cannot bind any future Congress.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Your idea is that we should not have a sort of contingent liability running on indefinitely?

Mr. KILDAY. That is right, that it should be terminated. We fixed a termination date originally, and I think this is the last time it should be extended.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. May I ask, just who are the sponsors of this bill?

Mr. KILDAY. I think we had six bills pending before the committee providing various dates at which the extension should terminate. We happened to report the one sponsored by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. PHILBIN].

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Was there any particular group?

Mr. KILDAY. All I know of is these individuals.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. I ask that because there came to my desk this morning a letter which has this paragraph in it. It has something to do with this discharge petition on FEPC. The last paragraph states this:

> May I earnestly request that if you support FEPC you sign this discharge petition at the earliest possible moment, since we want to bring it up as soon as we can.

It is signed, "FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT, JR."

It is hard to tell just what and who is back of some of the proposed legislation. I had always thought that the gentleman from New York [Mr. POWELL] was one of the original, enthusiastic and sincere supporters of this FEPC proposed legislation which had consideration by the Labor Committee. Now in that letter the word "we"—I do not know what "we" as carried in that letter means. Does the gentleman know anything about that?

Mr. KILDAY. I am sure the gentleman knows that I know nothing about that. I know of no reason why I should become involved in any of those controversies.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. I try to keep informed somewhat of what is coming up in the House and who is back of this, that, and the other, and what is going on, but I find it extremely difficult, especially in the last week or two.

I notice the gentleman from New York [Mr. POWELL] is on the floor. Maybe he can explain this little two-letter word "we."

Mr. Chairman, I yield back the balance of my time, but I am interested in that, and I would like to know, what does "we" mean in that letter from the gentleman from New York [Mr. ROOSEVELT].

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that a quorum is not present.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will count. [After counting.] Eighty-two Members are present, not a quorum. The Clerk will call the roll.

The Clerk called the roll, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

[Roll No. 17]

Bailey	Gwinn	Pfeiffer,
Bland	Hart	William L.
Boggs, La.	Hébert	Plumley
Brown, Ga.	Heller	Rabaut

Accordingly the Committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. KEOGH, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union, reported that that Committee, having had under consideration the bill H. R. 3205, and finding itself without a quorum, he had directed the roll to be called, when 358 Members responded to their names, a quorum, and he submitted herewith the names of the absentees to be spread upon the Journal.

The SPEAKER. The Committee will resume its sitting.

Mr. ELSTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. KEEFE].

Mr. KEEFE. Mr. Chairman, now that New York State's difficulties have been ironed out to the satisfaction of some people may we not get back to the business that is before the House? We have before us a bill which proposes to extend the time within which applications may be filed to ensure the payment of terminal leave. I am for that bill, but it raises a very serious question in my humble opinion which I, as a member of the Appropriations Committee of this House, would like to see resolved. You will observe that in presenting this bill the committee states:

> While no additional appropriations will be necessary for the payment of unused leave, the various departments concerned indicate that an additional cost to the Government of some $69,000 will be involved for the administration of the proposed measure.

Thus the Members of Congress are told that the only cost involved in the adoption of this proposed piece of legislation is the alleged $69,000 that will be needed in direct appropriation to provide for the cost of administration.

I have endeavored to make inquiry as to why that is true. It is alleged that there are some 21,000 people who may be eligible under this extension to file applications for terminal leave. If those applications are filed and approved under existing law and the extension granted under this legislation, where is the money coming from to pay that terminal leave? I was told that the appropriation which was originally made to implement the act passed in August of 1946 is still available with which to pay this terminal-leave obligation that will accrue under this particular bill.

Now, a query. I am seeking information and raising this question in order that we may have some clarification and some understanding as to the meaning of the constitutional provision which gives to the Congress the right to raise and support armies but says "No appropriation of money to that use shall be for a longer term than 2 years."

It has always been my understanding that an appropriation made for the support of the armed services of this Nation is available for expenditure for a period not to exceed 2 years. If that is true, and if the appropriation to implement the terminal-leave pay was made in 1946 or even in 1947, why, after the expiration of 2 years for which that appropriation is available for expenditure, has not any unused balance of that appropriation been returned to the Treasury of the United States? And if the armed services, in the event my premise is accurate, can have unused and unexpended balances lying around in their funds which they can put their hands on by transfers or reapportionment of appropriations already made, if they can use money that way to implement this bill and pay the terminal leave without a new appropriation being made, then what is the need for the constitutional provision and what need is there for making direct project appropriations with the usual provision that within those appropriations transfers may be limited to not to exceed 5 percent?

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KEEFE. I yield to the gentleman from South Dakota.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Of course, we all favor the passage of this bill, but the gentleman from Wisconsin has certainly raised an interesting point as to the availability of certain funds to carry it out. I am not now a member of the Appropriations Subcommittee which deals with the Army but was for a number of years, as the gentleman knows. This question was raised with regard to the continuing availability of funds for several of the projects for which appropriated in bills for the Army. It was generally held then that appropriations which related to equipment might be made for a period in excess of 2 years, but that appropriations under the heading of subsistence and pay were appropriations for the support of the Army and they could not be made available for more than 2 years.

This is a very interesting question because it relates to terminal-leave pay; that is, pay for terminal leave acquired during the pay period.

I think the gentleman has very properly raised a very important question, and offhand, consistent with the interpretations I have heard expressed, I would question the availability of 1946 Army money for this purpose.

Mr. KEEFE. I may say to the gentleman, from my service on the Committee on Appropriations over quite a period of years, I realize that in connection with appropriations of money made for housing, for the installation of equipment, and all that sort of thing, no one has ever questioned the availability of those funds for the necessary period of time in order to provide those installations. Here is an item that seems to me to relate specifically to the constitutional prohibition.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. It seems to be a pay item and should provide an interesting question for the constitutional lawyers in the General Accounting Office——

Mr. KEEFE. To raise and support armies, and it is directly and intimately associated with the pay and subsistence items which I have always understood heretofore Congress had no authority to make for a period of more than 2 years.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KEEFE. I yield to my distinguished friend, the gentleman from New York [Mr. TABER], who has served for many, many years on the Committee on Appropriations of the House.

Mr. TABER. There is another question, in addition to that, that would come up, and that is that these appropriations for pay of the Army and for such items as this are made on an annual basis, and this being a statute which extends and changes the law which was in effect at the time those appropriations were made, for the funds that were there appropriated, would not be available, because the particular statute that this bill creates was not in effect at the time those appropriations were available, nor during their availability.

Mr. KEEFE. Well, that is the way it looks to me, and it seems to me that there is a fundamental question involved, may I say to my very distinguished friend, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. KILDAY], in charge of this bill. I am not raising this question just for mere interference or to take up and consume time, but there is a very fundamental question relating to appropriation machinery.

Mr. KILDAY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KFEFE. I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. KILDAY. I agree with the gentleman from Wisconsin. Of course, there is a definite constitutional limitation on the maintenance of arms, but I think you will agree with me that that constitutional limitation does not apply, and that the Navy has never been subject to that limitation, nor the Coast Guard nor the Marine Corps, which are part of the armed forces, so that as to that phase of the bill which covers all of the services there could be no question from a constitutional standpoint. Now, as to the availability of the funds, we inquired into that, as our hearings will show. The message that came over to the Speaker reporting this bill mentions only the administrative cost. We had representatives of the Army, including the Air Force and the Navy, before us, and they all testified that they had on hand from previous appropriations a sufficient amount of money to pay the claims which are anticipated, averaging about $240 apiece, or about $5,000,000.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin has expired.

Mr. KILDAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman two additional minutes.

Of course, the question of what is included in the appropriation, its language, or the authority that the committee of the Congress might have, we, as a legislative committee, properly go along with the Committee on Appropriations. Representatives of the Departments told us that they had received appropriations, and now have on hand from previous appropriations sufficient funds for the discharge of the anticipated claims. That is as far as we went into that.

Mr. KEEFE. May I say to the gentleman that I, in conjunction with his colleague read some portions of that testimony, and I gained the impression that the Navy and its component parts had sufficient funds that they could lay their hands on.

Mr. KILDAY. They mentioned specifically $5,500,000.

Mr. KEEFE. But there was a question raised as to the availability of funds as far as the Army was concerned, and the Air Corps, as I read that testimony.

Mr. KILDAY. Captain Rotz appeared for the Army. The gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. HÉBERT] asked him if the money was available. Captain Rotz replied, "That is the Army share." There was some question as to allocation and the difference between an allocation and an appropriation, but to the specific question the representative of the Army, and, of course, the Air Force was included in the Army during this period of time, replied definitely that it was not.

Mr. KEEFE. If the gentleman will read that testimony carefully he will see that the availability of the funds is predicated upon reallocation of funds. Just what that means I do not know. Does that mean that the Army can reallocate for this purpose funds that may have been appropriated for some other purpose, that are available for expenditure longer than 2 years, and reallocate them for this purpose as to which a 2-year limitation would apply under the Constitution? I do not understand that testimony. I think I am fair in stating to my friend that any reasonable interpretation of the testimony of this Army officer would lead me to believe, at least, that it was very inconclusive.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin has expired.

Mr. KILDAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield two additional minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Would the gentleman agree that under the comity between committees that has always existed here we went as far as the gentleman would have expected us to go in inquiring into the Appropriations Committee's business?

Mr. KEEFE. Of course, I realize that thoroughly. I am raising this question not because of any particular brief I am holding for the Committee on Appropriations. That is not involved at all. I am raising what appears to me to be a very fundamental question.

Mr. KILDAY. If the funds are available it would only be as a result of a bill reported by the gentleman's committee under which the funds were appropriated.

Mr. KEEFE. No, that does not necessarily follow at all.

Mr. KILDAY. Where would they have gotten them?

Mr. KEEFE. Funds made available to the Army within the limitations of the constitutional provisions. If they did not expend the funds that were thus made available, have those funds lapsed into the Treasury under the constitutional provision, or are they made available through reallocation for a period longer than the 2 years? That is the question I am trying to get to.

Mr. KILDAY. The question of reallocation would be whether you had hedged your appropriation bill around in such a way that it could not be reallocated. From our standpoint, if they need the money, then they are going to have to deal with you. Is not that correct?

Mr. KEEFE. Neither the Appropriations Committee nor the gentleman's committee can change the plain mandate of the Constitution itself. That is why I have raised this question, so administratively we may be sure that in the administration and carrying out of the very worthy purposes of this bill, no question will arise in the future that will prevent the purposes from being carried out because of unavailability of funds.

Mr. VINSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KEEFE. I yield to the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. VINSON. I recognize fully what the gentleman says about the constitutional limitation of 2 years. Perhaps it might have been that when this bill was written and appropriations were made the money might have been made available to the President of the United States, and for that reason it is not necessary to make any direct appropriation now, because it all may not have been spent. In other words, it all depends on how the appropriation was originally made. Unfortunately, we do not have the information as to how the appropriation was originally made.

Mr. KEEFE. I am raising the question, as the gentleman well knows, so that this question may be fully explored and that we will not just rest on our oars and then wake up finally and find that some smart fellow down in the executive department has made a ruling that there are no funds available to carry out the splendid purposes of this act.

Mr. ELSTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield two additional minutes to the gentleman.

I would like to ask the gentleman, who is one of the able members on the Committee on Appropriations, if this legislation should pass and it should be determined that the funds heretofore appropriated could not be used, whether the Committee on Appropriations could not simply reappropriate the unexpended balances and make it available.

Mr. KEEFE. There is no question about that at all, and the supplemental estimate to implement this could be sent up here by the Bureau of the Budget to implement the Army's share of the payment of terminal leave. The Committee on Appropriations has the power and authority to make that appropriation. But that is a vastly different question than to say that the Army itself can, through processes of reallocation of funds, take away from the Congress itself the right to determine ultimately and finally whether they intend to implement this legislation by appropriation. That is the question which I am raising, to protect the constitutional integrity of the appropriating machinery and to protect the constitutional rights and prerogatives of the Congress itself.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. KEEFE. I am glad to yield to the gentleman.

Mr. WILLIAMS. If the gentleman recalls, several years ago, when the terminal-leave bonds were issued, there was quite a bit of difference in the law regarding the payment of terminal leave as it applied to officers and to enlisted men.

Mr. KEEFE. Yes; I recall that very distinctly.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I wonder if the gentleman is able to tell us whether those differences have now been reconciled and whether the law is the same as it applies both to officers and enlisted men.

Mr. KEEFE. The gentleman will have to get that information from the distinguished gentleman on the Committee on Military Affairs. Thank God, I have enough problems dealing with my own field, without being a walking encyclopedia so that I could be able to answer the question for the gentleman.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin has again expired.

Mr. KILDAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 minutes to the distinguished majority leader, the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. McCORMACK].

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Chairman, a very important event has taken place today which I heartily approve and which the people of our country, I know, will approve in as complete a manner as is possible, bringing pleasure not only to Americans, but to the people of Ireland. The President today has approved the recommendation of the State Department which was made upon the request of the Government of Ireland that the diplomatic relations between the two countries be raised to a complete diplomatic status of Ambassadorship, which means that no longer will our diplomatic relationship be carried on by a legation in the United States and a legation in Ireland, but that the American diplomatic representative to Ireland will be an Ambassador, and the Irish diplomatic representative to the United States will also be an Ambassador.

This is something I felt should have taken place many years ago. The fact that it has taken place today brings pleasure not only to the people of Ireland but to all Americans, without regard to their racial origin.

I congratulate President Truman in approving the recommendation of the State Department.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McCORMACK. I yield.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. I want to express my approval, too, if I may, and join with the gentleman. To show my sincerity, I move that the House adjourn, to celebrate the event.

Mr. McCORMACK. I did not yield to the gentleman for that purpose.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts has expired.

Mr. ELSTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MASON].

Mr. MASON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to speak out of order.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

There was no objection.

CLOSING OUR TAX LOOPHOLES

Mr. MASON. Mr. Chairman, President Truman in his tax message to the Congress recommended that we close by legislation many of the tax loopholes through which hundreds of millions of dollars in taxes are escaping the tax collector. With this part of the President's tax message I am in full accord. For 2 years now I have been urging the same action. In connection with the President's tax message, I have sent the following open letter to Mr. John W. Snyder, Secretary of the Treasury, calling his attention to the extent and numbers of these loopholes, and asking his aid in closing the same:

CONGRESS OF THE UNITED STATES,
HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D. C., January 23, 1950.

AN OPEN LETTER

Hon. JOHN W. SNYDER,
The Secretary of the Treasury,
Department of the Treasury,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. SECRETARY: The Congress will shortly undertake the revision of our tax statutes, looking particularly to the closing of loopholes through which scandalous sums of tax revenue are now escaping. My own estimate is that more than $1,000,000,000 of new revenue would immediately result from the adoption of my bill, H. R. 5064, to impose income tax on the business earnings of presently tax-exempt organizations and corporations, regardless of who owns them. One of my Democratic colleagues on the House Ways and Means Committee recently published his estimate that $5,000,000,000 of new tax income is available if loopholes in the law are closed and tax evaders are made to pay up.

But, Mr. Secretary, besides closing loopholes in the law, we must see to it that loopholes in Treasury rulings and regulations are also plugged. In the case of cooperatives, the Treasury has been exceedingly liberal over the years. Many times, as the record clearly shows, Treasury rulings have permitted the co-ops to escape even more tax on earnings than Congress contemplated when writing the exemption provisions of section 101, IRC. Today, as you can easily ascertain, more than half of all cooperatives prefer to escape taxation under Treasury rulings rather than under the law—because the advantage is just as great and there are no hampering legal restrictions.

A recent return on certain tax exempts, published by the Treasury, stated that eight to nine billion dollars of business volume was escaping income taxation. If ever an understatement was made, that is one. Actually, forty to fifty billion dollars of business volume is now being done by tax-exempt corporations and organizations. And, most amazing of all, it now appears that nearly one-third of the total wealth of the United States has got into the hands of tax exempts, $157,000,000,000 out of a total of $540,000,000,000. That is more than twice the value of all stocks listed on the New York Stock Exchange.

Mr. Secretary, tax-exempt organizations are out of hand. A snowball of yesterday has become an avalanche today—an avalanche that threatens the very existence of our private enterprise system. Public resentment against this octopus is mounting. The day of reckoning is at hand. Doing business without paying taxes has become the biggest racket in the United States. It is relentlessly pushing our long-established system of profit enterprise toward socialization and destruction. Absorption of independent tax-paying business by nontaxable organizations will go on at a constantly accelerated pace unless we take drastic action to prevent it.

Mr. Secretary, the two greatest demands from American taxpayers today are for immediate repeal of wartime excise taxes and the plugging of loopholes in our present-day tax laws. These two demands dovetail perfectly. Put them together in one package and you have a real solution of two perplexing problems. If this is done, taxpayers will be pleased; business will be given new incentive to expand and go forward; the Treasury will gain in revenue; and at the same time we will ease the tax load that now rests so heavily upon the overtaxed.

Members of both parties on the Ways and Means Committee are urging that such corrective measures be made a part of the 1950 revenue bill. I am writing you to enlist your interest and your assistance. The stake is $1,000,000,000. This will permit the reduction of wartime excise taxes without placing any added burden on those who are now carrying more than their fair load of taxation. Will you help us establish tax equality and at the same time lighten the tax load?

Respectfully submitted.

N. M. MASON,
Member of Congress.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will count. [After counting.] Evidently a quorum is not present.

The Clerk will call the roll.

[Roll No. 18]

Accordingly the Committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. HARRIS, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union, reported that that Committee, having had under consideration the bill H. R. 3205, and finding itself without a quorum, he had directed the roll to be called, when 349 Members responded to their names, a quorum, and he submitted herewith the names of the absentees to be spread upon the Journal.

The Committee resumed its sitting.

Mr. ELSTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Florida [Mr. HERLONG].

Mr. HERLONG. Mr. Chairman, I am here today to speak for this bill. At the outset I should like to pay tribute to my beloved and distinguished colleague from Florida [Mr. ROGERS] for his efforts in originally sponsoring the legislation that resulted in the veterans getting terminal-leave pay. He has done a great service for the veterans. I want to pay tribute to him for that service.

Mr. PETERSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HERLONG. I yield.

Mr. PETERSON. I want to join with my colleague in paying tribute to our colleague. We in Florida are grateful to him. We know of the work that he has done from the very beginning on the original bill and the interest he has manifested in this bill and in all matters affecting veterans. I know that our veterans realize that, but I thought I would be remiss in my duty unless I called attention to it in the RECORD that is being made here today, so that our veterans should know that we feel the same way.

Mr. HERLONG. I thank the gentleman for his remarks.

Mr. Chairman, I should like to say further, I am sure all veterans understand and appreciate the devotion of the gentleman from Florida to their cause. He has worked diligently and capably for them.

As has been already explained, this bill extends the privilege of a veteran to apply for his terminal-leave pay to June 30, 1951. This does two things. It gives the veteran a little more time to file an application, and further, it places it on a fiscal-year basis. No further money will have to be appropriated.

There has been delay, of course, in getting these applications in. Some 21,000 people have not received the money which the rest of the veterans have received. We want to see that they are properly compensated along with the rest of them.

Mr. DAVIS of Georgia. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HERLONG. I yield.

Mr. DAVIS of Georgia. Does the gentleman know how many applications have been submitted which have not been passed upon for the reason that the time for applications had expired?

Mr. HERLONG. I think it is around 13,000, if I am not mistaken.

Mr. DAVIS of Georgia. If this bill should be enacted, will it have the effect of reopening the matter so that those veterans who have already applied and whose applications have been denied may again apply and have their applications passed upon just as though the application had not been denied?

Mr. HERLONG. That is correct. I thank the gentleman for his statement.

May I say that while the total number of veterans who have not received their pay under this provision of the law seems comparatively small, at the same time it is important to so many of them who have applied and who were turned down because they were late and many times the tardiness was through no fault of their own.

One of the first cases I ever had in court involved something about $25,000. I remember at that time the judge told me to hurry up and get through with that case because he had an important case coming up. To me that was the most important case in the world, because it dealt with something that was mine. If we treat these things as unimportant because there are just a few or because only a small amount is involved, we are overlooking the individual, and it is not doing justice to the individual who cannot help himself. It may seem small to us, but it is most important and is a mighty big thing to the individual who has been left out. I hope we will take this into consideration in voting on this bill today.

Mr. DAVIS of Georgia. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HERLONG. I yield.

Mr. DAVIS of Georgia. I would like to ask the gentleman whether or not these applications could be processed by employees of the Government who are already holding positions with the Government, or whether or not it would require the reestablishment of an agency or bureau or department in order to process the application.

Mr. HERLONG. I understand it would not require the reestablishment of any agency or department, or the creation of any new agency; that the same agencies or bureaus can handle it as are handling it at this time.

Mr. DAVIS of Georgia. Over a period of something like 15 months, which would be provided by this amendment, the gentleman feels it would be possible for existing facilities to process this number, even if all of them should apply during that period of time?

Mr. HERLONG. Yes, sir; I do.

Mr. DAVIS of Georgia. And it would not bring on any additional expense to the Government?

Mr. HERLONG. That is correct, and I thank the gentleman for his remarks.

I can say this, that we are receiving letters every day from veterans asking us to explain why they have not gotten their money, and we find it very hard to say, "You did not file by a certain date and therefore you cannot get your money." Government red tape is not a popular thing and is very difficult for many people to understand. They look to the equities of each case rather than to any technical ground upon which their applications may be refused.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HERLONG. I yield.

Mr. WHEELER. Does the gentleman know the major reason or reasons for the failure of these 21,000 to apply?

Mr. HERLONG. Of course, it had been called to their attention through advertisements, but at the same time a great many of these people did not get this information, and in some cases the veterans' agencies in the counties and States did not properly process their applications in time. I think that is one of the main reasons for it.

Mr. MICHENER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HERLONG. I yield.

Mr. MICHENER. The trouble is not on the part of the Government, is it?

Mr. HERLONG. No, sir. It is on the part of the local agencies.

Mr. MICHENER. I have had a great many of these letters, but some of the men did not know they had to make application. They knew something had to be done, but they just expected it to come through. I think the Government is doing a pretty good job in trying to get these things out.

Mr. HERLONG. At the time of the original debate on this bill it was called to our attention, and placed in the RECORD, that these people could not expect to get their checks the next day or the next week after the bill was passed. At the same time, there was a natural reluctance on the part of the veteran to push himself forward to get this money when it was there available for him. He just thought he was going to get it as a matter of course, in spite of the newspaper stories that were printed.

Mr. WHEELER. Will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. HERLONG. I yield.

Mr. WHEELER. Assuming that 5,000 veterans fail to apply this year, does the gentleman know whether or not there is any proposal which would again extend it for another year?

Mr. HERLONG. There is no proposal to extend it for another year. As I understand the Judge Advocate General of the Navy, who has written a letter which appears in the report, states that they would not agree to any further extension of this time.

Mr. WHEELER. The point I was attempting to make was simply that if, under the first act, there were 21,000 people who did not know the proper procedure which they should follow in order to get their terminal-leave pay, then it is possible to believe that there would be some number who would still not know about it when this date shall have expired.

Mr. HERLONG. That might possibly happen, although I think the veterans' organizations are so well organized now that the information will be brought to their attention that this is their last chance and that they will not have another opportunity. I think the applications will be filed on time.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HERLONG. I yield.

Mr. JOHNSON. The opinion of the subcommittee that studied this bill—and I was a member of it—was that this should be the last extension granted in this matter.

Mr. HERLONG. That is the way I understand it.

Mr. JOHNSON. Is it thoroughly known to everybody that they still have 3 years to file their claims? I cannot see very much excuse for extending it beyond the 3-year period.

Mr. HERLONG. I agree with the gentleman. I think it should be given proper publicity all over the country and I believe that the veterans' organizations will see to that.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Florida has expired.

Mr. ELSTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield one additional minute to the gentleman from Florida.

Mr. BISHOP. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HERLONG. I yield.

Mr. BISHOP. Is it not true that this Congress could not bind the next Congress in that program?

Mr. HERLONG. Certainly that is true.

Mr. Chairman, I hope the bill passes unanimously.

Mr. KILDAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 1 minute.

Mr. Chairman, referring to the questions asked by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. KEEFE], I wish to insert in the RECORD a portion of the First Supplemental Appropriation Act of 1947 under the title "Executive Office of the President, Armed Forces Leave Payments":

Payments under the Armed Forces Leave Act of 1946: For all expenses necessary to enable the President through the Treasury, War, and Navy Departments to carry out the provisions of the Armed Forces Leave Act of 1946, including cash payments to members and former members of the armed forces, payments to the Treasurer of the United States of amounts representing the face value of bonds issued to such servicemen, and administrative expenses until June 30, 1948, including printing and binding, penalty mail costs, and personal services in the District of Columbia and elsewhere without regard to section 14 (a) of the Federal Employees Pay Act of 1946, $2,431,708,000, to be available (except as to administrative expenses) until expended and for allocation to said departments by transfer to and merger with appropriations thereof or otherwise, in the amounts respectively as may be determined by the Director of the Bureau of the Budget.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order that a quorum is not present.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will count. [After counting.] One hundred and fourteen Members are present, a quorum.

Mr. KILDAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. PHILBIN], author of the bill under consideration.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PHILBIN. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Chairman, may I say that I have had a number of instances similar to those envisioned by this bill where men have failed to apply in time for their terminal leave. I very vigorously support the measure and commend the gentleman from Massachusetts for introducing this bill, which I feel will be very helpful to veterans who through no fault of their own failed to get what was coming to them.

Mr. PHILBIN. I thank the gentleman from New York, one of the most able Members of the House, for his very kind observation.

Mr. Chairman, I also want to thank my very able and distinguished friend from Texas [Mr. KILDAY], for the excellent statement he has made in support of this bill.

The bill is a very simple one. There is nothing mysterious or complex about it.

In 1946 the Congress enacted legislation which granted credit to the enlisted personnel of the armed services for unused terminal leave and authorized the issuance of bonds for such unused leave. Under the particular measure it was required that all applications for terminal leave should be filed prior to September 1, 1947.

In 1947 when we passed legislation permitting terminal-leave bonds to be cashed, we extended the limitation date until September 1, 1948.

Recently through many communications, letters, and reports we have received from veterans throughout the country, it would appear there are several thousand veterans who for one reason or another did not apply for their terminal-leave payment prior to September 1, 1948. There were many reasons given and assigned by these veterans for failure to file in time. In some cases it may have been ordinary inadvertence. In other cases the veterans concerned were in veterans' hospitals under treatment for war-incurred disabilities or sickness. But whatever may be the cause, in every instance which this bill seeks to relieve, the terminal-leave credit was definitely earned by the veteran. It is not a gift, bounty, or gratuity.

It is now merely a question whether the Congress will continue and extend the filing date so as to permit these veterans who have not filed up to this time to make their applications for this entitlement.

Like other colleagues who have preceded me in discussing this measure and who have contributed so much to the debate, I am very conscious of the fact that the Congress cannot be expected to continue this limitation indefinitely. Nevertheless, it seems to me that in fairness, in simple justice, and in equity to many thousands of veterans, we should at this time extend the filing date as provided by the pending bill to June 1951 so as to give those who have not filed up to this time another opportunity to secure the benefits to which they are entitled under the provisions of the law.

Mr. BROOKS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PHILBIN. I yield to the gentleman from Louisiana.

Mr. BROOKS. I want to commend the gentleman for his diligence in pursuing this legislation and may I say that I filed one of the regional terminal-leave-pay bills. I also was a member of the small subcommittee which worked out the original terminal-leave-pay bill.

This character of legislation, of course, differs very greatly from the type of legislation where there is a gift or bonus given to a veteran. This is a case where a man has earned the money and I think our limitation laws, as the gentleman so well said, should be much more lenient in letting a man claim what he has earned than claiming what is given to him as a beneficence or a gift; therefore I think the legislation is most proper.

Mr. PHILBIN. I appreciate the gentleman's views, because he has made conspicuous contributions to this and other legislation on behalf of the veterans.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PHILBIN. I yield to the distinguished gentlewoman from Massachusetts.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. I know many veterans will be very grateful to the gentleman who is the author of this bill. There is no better friend of the servicemen than is the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. PHILBIN. I exceedingly appreciate the kind and gracious observation of the gentlewoman, who is an outstanding friend of the veteran in the Nation.

Mr. Chairman, I believe that the objectives of this measure are entirely reasonable, and I believe, if the Members will reflect on those objectives, that they will come to the same conclusion. I hope that the House will be disposed to take favorable action on this measure so that the veterans will be given another opportunity to file.

Mr. DURHAM. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PHILBIN. I gladly yield to the able gentleman from North Carolina, an invaluable member of the Armed Services Committee.

Mr. DURHAM. I also wish to congratulate the gentleman for introducing this measure. It carries out an obligation which I feel we should extend to these veterans so that every individual can avail himself of the opportunity to receive it. There is no difference in this policy and the policy that has been adopted in regard to veterans over the past 25 years. We veterans of the First World War were given every consideration by the Congress in extending applications for insurance policies and other things.

Mr. PHILBIN. That is quite true—a most timely comment.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PHILBIN. I am pleased to yield to the talented gentleman from California, who serves so ably and effectively on the committee.

Mr. JOHNSON. I would also like to add my commendation to that of the others to the gentleman for his diligence in proposing this legislation. To show you how much we all thought of his idea, as well as of him personally, you will remember that the committee unanimously voted to report the bill out. I am also pleased to hear the gentleman say that he feels that perhaps this should be the last extension of terminal-leave pay; in other words, in 3 years everybody who is diligent in the slightest degree ought to be able to get his claim in and get it paid. I think it is a very just bill, and I hope it will pass by a unanimous vote.

Mr. PHILBIN. I thank the gentleman for his generous observation, which, as usual, contributes so appropriately to this discussion.

Mr. KILDAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Florida [Mr. ROGERS].

Mr. ELSTON. Mr. Chairman, I too yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Florida [Mr. ROGERS].

Mr. ROGERS of Florida. Mr. Chairman, first I want to thank the gentleman from Texas [Mr. KILDAY] and the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. ELSTON] for permitting me to use 10 minutes discussing what I think is a very important measure.

Mr. Chairman, this measure extends the provisions of H. R. 4051 to those veterans who have not taken nor had an opportunity to take advantage of the provisions of that bill. In order that the House and the new Members, who were not here during the Seventy-ninth Congress, might know something of the history of this bill, I would like to relate it, because this bill had a very rough road to travel, and I do that in order that they might fully understand the matter now before the House.

Mr. DOLLIVER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROGERS of Florida. I yield to the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. DOLLIVER. It seems to me, Mr. Chairman, I recall that the gentleman from Florida [Mr. ROGERS], now at the microphone, is the author, and the originator, and the man who pushed through the original legislation to pay terminal leave for the privates and the noncommissioned officers of the last war. Am I correct about that, sir?

Mr. ROGERS of Florida. That is correct.

Mr. DOLLIVER. I want to compliment the gentleman for a fine piece of work.

Mr. ROGERS of Florida. I appreciate the gentleman's statement, and I also appreciate the kind remarks of the gentlemen from Florida [Mr. HERLONG and Mr. PETERSON].

On September 13, 1945, I introduced H. R. 4051. That bill lay in the Committee on Military Affairs until just before we went home for the Easter holidays in 1946. It came out, not from the Committee on Military Affairs, but upon a discharge petition which I filed in the well of the House, and through the efforts of a number of Members here, including the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BECKWORTH] and the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. WICKERSHAM] and others who worked very arduously on this measure, we were able to secure the required number of signatures to that petition shortly before Easter 1946. We got 218 Members to sign it. As a consequence it came out on the floor. After it did come out, the Committee on Military Affairs reconsidered it, and came out with my bill, H. R. 4051, with amendments. The amendments made by that committee of course were satisfactory to me.

The bill had a very easy time passing the House when we got it to a vote. There was not a single Member of the House who voted against it. Then it went to the Senate, and Senator ED JOHNSON led the fight for it there. However, they amended the bill in the Senate by providing that terminal-leave pay should be made in bonds instead of in cash. This was right at the last of the second session of the Seventy-ninth Congress, and when the measure came back to the House, and when conferees were appointed, they agreed to accept the Senate amendment, because we could not get anything else through at that time. As the author of the bill, I rose on the floor and argued for the passage of the bill with the Senate amendment, with the proviso that the first bill I would introduce in the first session of the Eightieth Congress would be a bill to provide that these bonds be paid in cash.

I got permission from the then Clerk of the House, the Honorable South Trimble, to have the No. 2 place on the calendar of the Eightieth Congress. There was one man who beat me to the No. 1 place. Unfortunately, the Republicans got control of the House in the Eightieth Congress, and what Mr. Trimble had promised me would be the No. 2 place became No. 3, of which I was proud. May I say for Mr. Andrews, who was the Republican Clerk of the House, that he was nice to me in giving me No. 3. That was the bill providing for the payment of these bonds in cash.

The bill finally was reported, and came out as a new bill from the committee. The bill provided that these bonds should be redeemable in cash upon the application of the holder of the bond.

That is the history of terminal-leave pay.

This is an illustration of how the will of this House can be worked without the rule that we adopted the first of the last session, the so-called 21-day rule. When a majority of the Members of this House want legislation they can get it, and they could get it without the rule we adopted and over which we had a fight a few days ago, because we have Calendar Wednesday and we have the discharge petition by which, when we can get 218 signatures, we can get a measure before the House.

Mr. DURHAM. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROGERS of Florida. I yield to the gentleman from North Carolina.

Mr. DURHAM. We in the House all know how diligent the gentleman from Florida [Mr. ROGERS] has been in taking care of matters pertaining to the veterans. In the early days, of course, with expenditures running rather high, it was somewhat difficult for some of us to arrive at a conclusion as to what was the best thing to do with regard to the expenditure of funds. The gentleman from Florida got his bill to the floor and the House voted unanimously for it. I congratulate him on his interest in this measure today.

Mr. ROGERS of Florida. I thank the gentleman. The gentleman gave me his cooperation at every stage in connection with this bill. His was a great contribution.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROGERS of Florida. I yield to the gentleman from Mississippi.

Mr. WILLIAMS. We all know the gentleman from Florida [Mr. ROGERS] is the father of the terminal-leave-pay bill. I think it only fitting that the Members should come here to hear him.

Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that a quorum is not present.

The CHAIRMAN. A quorum is not present. The Clerk will call the roll.

The Clerk called the roll, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

Accordingly the Committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. HARRIS, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union, reported that that Committee, having had under consideration the bill H. R. 3205, and finding itself without a quorum, he had directed the roll to be called, when 348 Members responded to their names, a quorum, and he submitted herewith the names of the absentees to be spread upon the Journal.

The SPEAKER. The Committee will resume its sitting.

Mr. ROGERS of Florida. Mr. Chairman, to continue my remarks on the bill, H. R. 3205 with reference to extending the time for filing applications for terminal-leave pay, may I conclude by saying that the original bill, H. R. 4051, was passed to take care of every veteran who had terminal-leave pay coming to him.

I hope this House will unanimously pass this bill. Irrespective of whether or not a veteran has filed his application up to this time, he still should be permitted to take advantage of the provisions of this bill. This bill extends the time for filing applications to June 30, 1951. A veteran came into my office last year who was entitled to his terminal-leave pay. He had been at sea all the time, he said, and had no opportunity to file an application, yet the first time he did have an opportunity to file it he came in to file it, I sent it in, and he could not get his terminal-leave pay. This will take care of just such injustices as that.

As I previously said, on the floor of this House, on veteran legislation, and I say again, "There is nothing too good for our veterans."

Mr. ELSTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from Washington [Mr. HORAN].

Mr. HORAN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed out of order.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Washington?

There was no objection.

Mr. HORAN. Mr. Chairman, the damage from the coal strike continues to expand. Yesterday I received the following wire from the Growers' Clearing House Association of the State of Washington:

Refrigerator-car shortage Pacific Northwest seriously restricting movement of apples imposing additional burden on industry through aggravating an existing critical marketing problem. Understand coal shortage an important factor. Our organization representing 2,000 growers request you use your influence to relieve this emergency.

Other telegrams I have received are along the same lines. For instance, the Wenatchee Valley Traffic Association has wired me:

Recent order limiting coal-burning railroads contributing to car shortage in Northwest. We have fruit maturing; must continue to move. This is acute emergency and urge you investigate. Use every influence permit coal-burning lines move empty reefers for perishable transportation.

And a telegram from Gwin, White & Prince, Inc., Seattle, states:

Regardless statement President that no emergency exists account Lewis coal program shortage coal preventing eastern railroads hauling empty refrigerator cars west-bound for delivery their western connections. Only loaded cars and passengers being hauled so says President Gavin, Great Northern. Today only 350 empty refrigerator cars on line Great Northern. Shortage exists on Milwaukee, Northern Pacific roads. Apple shippers, Wenatchee district, not furnished fourth cars absolutely necessary daily. Preponderance large-size apples this season makes imperative apples move now, not months later. Railroads pay only mileage on refrigerator cars; no cost them when not rolling. Can you help relieve situation immediately?

Thus we see that work stoppages and enforced idleness not only destroy the American farmer's market but also restrict his ability to transport his goods to it.

The President should act, and act at once.

Mr. ELSTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself such time as I may require.

Mr. Chairman, I am very much in favor of this bill. It received a unanimous report from the Committee on Armed Services, and I have not received a request for time from any Member of the House in opposition to its provisions.

Mr. Chairman, if the purpose of this bill was to permit only those veterans to file applications who have been negligent in the presentation of their claims, I would not favor it. But the record before our committee indicates that a great many injustices would be done if this bill is not passed. Some cases are those of veterans in hospitals who never knew that they were entitled to terminal leave. Some are cases of veterans whose return from overseas was delayed. If this bill does not pass they will have no opportunity to make claim for their terminal-leave pay.

The pending bill should receive the unanimous vote of the House.

Mr. Chairman, at this time I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. HARE].

Mr. HARE. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to speak out of order and revise and extend my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from South Carolina?

There was no objection.

Mr. HARE. Mr. Chairman, originally I had no intention to speak on this measure, because most, if not all, Members favor it; but after listening to the debate and observing the procedure here today, I cannot help but be reminded of the story of the three bulls—the big bull, the middle-sized bull, and the little bull. The big bull could always run up to the pasture fence and jump right over it without any trouble at all. The middle-sized bull could run up to the pasture fence and would have to run down the fence a little piece before it could get over. But the little bull could run up to the fence and he would have to run a long way down the fence before it could get over. The moral to that story is that a little bull must go a long way.

After listening to the debate and observing the proceedings, I think we all appreciate that today a little bull must go a long way.

Mr. Chairman, the purpose behind this measure, as I understand it, is to enable a number of veterans of the last war, the enlisted personnel, to avail themselves of provisions of the law which, for some reason or another, they have not had an opportunity to do heretofore. That being the case, it is absolutely incumbent upon this Congress to take care of them and permit them to do so. I will call your attention to the fact that the officer personnel, upon their release from the armed services following the last war, were paid a terminal-leave bonus, so to speak, at the time. Why the enlisted personnel were not I do not know.

But, the Congress, in its wisdom, saw fit to make provisions for enlisted personnel some time later. It is now up to us to continue, in order that we can keep faith with the intent of the Congress in the enactment of the original legislation.

With the permission of the Chairman, and the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union, I was granted unanimous consent to digress from the subject a little bit. Today we have heard a great deal, as we have in the past few days, about this unfortunate piece of legislation known as the FEPC.

Coming from the State of South Carolina, my position is well known, and it is an unalterable position. However, I would like to call the attention of the Congress to a piece of legislation that is now pending, which, in my opinion, is far more important to the American public, because of its relation to the economic status of this country, than the FEPC. I am not sure of the exact number, but I think it is House Joint Resolution 398. In any event, it is a resolution sponsored by the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. COOLEY] on behalf of the Committee on Agriculture, which will amend the existing acreage allotment and marketing quota provisions of the law that we passed during the recent session of the Congress. It is my impression, and I hope I am incorrect, that the Department of Agriculture, without laying specific blame on any individual, is certainly not administering the law within the complete intent of this Congress.

I might cite an illustration. In a county in my district, Greenwood County, they normally plant 8,000 acres of cotton without any acreage regulations in force. Under the existing acreage-allotment law they are allotted 9,000 acres of cotton, an increase of 1,000 acres. Yet there are farmers, one-horse and two-horse and larger farmers, who have been cut in their cotton acreage as much as 60 and 75 percent. I am sure that this Congress had no intention of doing that, and I am convinced that their cut is due primarily to the administration of the law by the Department of Agriculture and the Production and Marketing Administration.

The purpose of the Cooley resolution is to aid in rectifying such an injustice as that. If the farmers of this country are going to be penalized and deprived of a normal livelihood, then the only thing that we can expect in the immediate future is a recession on all of the economic fronts in this country. That is, the farmer as a group is, by and large, the greatest purchaser of commodities in this country. If he does not have any purchasing power, how can the employers and employees of manufacturing industries expect to survive? Employees will be out of employment because the manufacturer will have no outlet for his goods. If that should become the case, how damaging could it be on our economy, and where would the Federal Government get its forty or fifty billion per annum to spend in support of the Government and to take care of the foreign nations to which we have obligated ourselves?

I bring that to the attention of this Congress with the hope that on tomorrow the Committee on Rules will see fit to grant a rule on this resolution, in order that it may come up for consideration.

Mr. FISHER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARE. I yield.

Mr. FISHER. The gentleman has referred to the cotton acreage situation in the State from which he comes, and the manner in which it has been administered. I would like to ask the gentleman if he has had any complaints with respect to the accuracy of that base year—that is, the acreage planted. I understand that the Department has depended upon the Bureau of Agricultural Economics for the figures. I know a number of cases where those figures have not been accurate. I think they have been accurate generally on a Nation-wide or perhaps a State-wide basis, but when reduced to the county level or the individual farm level they have not been accurate. That is not particularly the fault of the BAE, because the facilities they have to observe individual farm acreage situations is limited. They have depended upon the ginning records and spot checks of individual farms in various counties; but I know a number of situations where those checks have not resulted in accuracy. I am wondering if the gentleman has observed that situation in the State from which he comes?

Mr. HARE. I certainly have; the gentleman is absolutely correct.

The figures of the BAE, by and large, from a National or State basis are just about as accurate as can be had; but from the county standpoint they are absolutely inaccurate, from cross-county ginnings, failure of ginners to report the county in which the cotton was produced, and for a number of other reasons. I think the distribution of acreage on the adjusted BAE figures is the primary cause for so much unrest and the many inequities that now exist. The only way, in my opinion, to correct the situation is to change the law so that acreage allotments hereafter will be based on actual plantings by the individual farmers; that is, the plantings he can prove. Of course I am opposed to any control of acreage and I think the law should be repealed. Acreage control is nothing more than governmental regimentation of agriculture.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from South Carolina has expired.

Mr. ELSTON. Mr. Chairman, may I inquire how the time stands?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio has 12 minutes remaining, the gentleman from Texas has 6.

Mr. ELSTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. WHITE].

Mr. WHITE of California. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to speak out of order and to revise and extend my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California?

There was no objection.

Mr. WHITE of California. Mr. Chairman, I wish to devote these 5 minutes to a discussion of the matter on which the distinguished gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. HARE] has just spoken. I am sorry to say that I must entirely disagree with the gentleman in his statement that the trouble with the existing cotton acreage law is its administration by the Department of Agriculture. I believe that anyone who has really studied the situation will grant that the trouble has come about through the administration by the county committees. Everyone knows that the county committeemen are elected by the farmers; they are farmers themselves. The Department of Agriculture has absolutely nothing to do with directing those people; that is, directing their decisions, and the bill which we passed in this Congress states very plainly in the reserving of the 15-percent reserve designed to cure the so-called hardship cases, that it rests entirely in the discretion of the county committee. I ask you in view of that, How can the Department of Agriculture be blamed?

Getting down to the BAE figures, we must not forget that we had this long hiatus during the war years when they did not keep figures because the personnel had gone away to war and because there were no control programs. The Department had to do the best it could in order to get some figures to go back under crop-production controls, and they had to ask the farmers how much acreage they had planted in certain years. The farmers reported too many acres, and the Department had to squeeze the water out of them. Certainly, it is going to be unjust to the people who are honest in favor of those who are dishonest; but if there is any individual who has been unfairly treated and he can prove it, all he has to do is to appeal to the State appeal committee. If that committee grants his request and finds he has told the truth, all the committee has to do is to pull that acreage out of thin air and give it to that farmer under existing law. All those cases can be rectified in that manner if the grower appeals in time. So I hope everybody will quit talking about these BAE figures and damning the Department of Agriculture because it is not their fault. The fault lies, Mr. Chairman, in the way the law was set up.

Mr. FISHER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WHITE of California. I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. FISHER. Is the gentleman talking now about existing law or the Cooley resolution?

Mr. WHITE of California. Existing law. This relief is available under existing law when the grower files his appeal in time, but the time has now expired for filing appeals but this time would be renewed for 15 days under the Cooley resolution.

I would like to go on now, because I want to make an additional point. The Farm Bureau circulated a letter here today which, in effect, would nullify the Cooley amendment, if their amendments are adopted. This is the same group that wrote the last law. I fought it tooth and nail and I will fight them again, because they are trying to convert this cotton-acreage allotment business into one of putting it on the basis of how much land a man has instead of how much cotton has been planted. There is no justice in it and the Farm Bureau amendment should be defeated. The Cooley amendment should prevail just as it left the committee, except that I hope the 40-percent limitation on cropland will be removed.

Mr. FISHER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WHITE of California. I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. FISHER. As the gentleman says, that is the law now and they can appeal to the State committee and have their complaint heard. The acreage may be increased if the claim is supported. Is that the gentleman's statement?

Mr. WHITE of California. That is correct, except that the appeal time has expired under present law but would be renewed by the Cooley resolution.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from California has expired.

Mr. DAVIS of Georgia. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that a quorum is not present.

The CHAIRMAN (after counting). One hundred and seventeen Members are present, a quorum.

Mr. ELSTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield the balance of my time to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. GARY].

Mr. GARY. Mr. Chairman, for a change I shall discuss the bill before the House.

Mr. Chairman, on February 9, 1949, I introduced H. R. 2594 to further amend section 5 of the Armed Forces Leave Act of 1946 by extending the time for making applications for terminal leave pay to September 1, 1951. This was the first bill introduced on that subject. Now, I am not going to fuss with the committee for reporting out the bill of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. PHILBIN], a member of the committee, rather than my own. In the words of the immortal poet, Omar Khayyám, I am perfectly willing to take the cash and let the credit go.

I voted for the terminal leave pay bill when it was first before this Congress because I felt at that time that the officers having received terminal leave pay, it was a rank injustice not to give it to the enlisted men also. The bill passed the House almost unanimously.

There are approximately 21,000 GI's who have not received their terminal-leave pay simply because they did not file their applications within the time prescribed by that act. They are just as much entitled to it as anyone else who was a member of the armed forces. I am advised that the Navy Department alone reported that on October 12, 1949, claims of naval and former naval personnel numbering 1,746 had been rejected due to late filing by claimants, and that in 21 cases of the claims rejected failure to file in time was not due to the fault of the veterans but rather to delays caused by non-Federal agencies. Two cases have come to my attention in which the veteran was not at fault. One involved a veteran who because of a nervous disorder has not filed an application, and the other a veteran living in a rural district who was not aware until recently that he was entitled to terminal-leave pay.

It would be a great injustice to those veterans who are entitled to their terminal-leave pay if they were denied that pay merely because of failure to file an application. Especially is that true in those cases where the failure was caused not by the fault of the veteran, but because of some other circumstance.

Therefore, Mr. Chairman, it gives me very great pleasure to endorse the bill which is now before this body. Although my bill would have extended the time to September 1, 1951, I think there is sound reason for closing the time for filing these applications on June 30, 1951, which is the end of the fiscal year. This, as the committee reports, will permit better fiscal planning for the administrative costs involved.

Mr. KILDAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself the balance of the time.

Mr. Chairman, we have debated almost everything that might appear on the calendar, whether on Calendar Wednesday or any other day, but now that we are terminating general debate I do want to get back to the bill. It is a bill which should be passed today. I can assure all of you that the Committee on Armed Services has adopted a resolution directing several of us to call up some six or seven additional bills which would be in order today. I personally have two more which were considered by the subcommittee of which I am chairman. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. DURHAM] has three which were considered by his subcommittee, and I believe the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. VINSON] has either two or three which were considered by the full committee. So there is plenty of additional work if that is what you want.

This bill does create a situation in which justice may be done to a group of men who are as much entitled to their terminal leave pay, as those who collected it very promptly. I hope that we can terminate the debate this afternoon and vote on it. It seems at this time as if most likely there would be a roll call on final passage of the bill, which would run us rather late in the afternoon. This is a bill of importance, and one that I hope will be passed today without fail.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. KILDAY. I yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. After the passage of this bill today, is it the purpose of the committee to call up another bill, or do we then adjourn?

Mr. KILDAY. The purpose of the committee is to do whatever is required of it, because it is Calendar Wednesday, and our committee has the call. We have some five or six bills that we are ready at this time to call up and attempt to have considered. Whether the House remains in session or adjourns is not in our control; it is in the control of the majority of the House. If they want to stay here until midnight we can keep them occupied until midnight.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Is it your purpose to continue to call up bills if the House stays in session?

Mr. KILDAY. If the House stays in session, I am sure the three I have mentioned will be able to keep you busy until midnight.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Then the FEPC supporters might just as well adjourn, because they will not get on today, anyway?

Mr. KILDAY. The gentleman can have his argument. I am going to talk about the bills brought up by the Committee on Armed Services.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KILDAY. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. KEATING. Of course, we are anxious to expedite the business here today so that we can get on with the call of the other matters that would come up on Calendar Wednesday. Does the gentleman know of any reason for a roll call? Is there any opposition to this measure?

Mr. KILDAY. I know of none, but we have had many roll calls today. I am being a little bit practical. You know I am supposed to be in charge of the bill. Apparently I am, after 8 or 10 other Members have completed controlling the time for us. So I am not in a position to say, as you might be able to say when handling a bill, just what you might expect. But we are willing, able, and ready to do whatever the majority says they want done on Calendar Wednesday. We are perfectly willing to stay until midnight. I hope this bill will be passed today without delay.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

All time has expired. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 5 of the Armed Forces Leave Act of 1946, as amended (37 U. S. C., sec. 34), is hereby amended by striking out "September 1, 1948" wherever it appears in such section and inserting in lieu thereof "September 1, 1949."

Committee amendment: Page 1, line 6, strike out "September 1, 1949", and insert "June 30, 1951."

Mr. LECOMPTE. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, I shall not take the 5 minutes allotted to me since I only want to say that there never was any rhyme or reason for the War Department or for the Navy Department paying terminal leave to officers and not extending terminal-leave pay to the enlisted men. I have never been able to find out from the members of the Committee on Armed Services, or from anyone connected with the War Department, just what the statutory authority was for paying officers terminal-leave pay at the rate of 2½ days per month, which amounted to 30 days a year, with no terminal leave for the enlisted men.

The Congress, finally, in desperation, in order to do justice to the great body of enlisted men, passed an act which gave terminal leave to all of the enlisted men in the armed services, thus doing only simple justice to these heroic men.

I hope this bill will be passed today without any delay and without serious opposition because it extends to those who, for one reason or another, have not been able to or have overlooked the opportunity of putting in their applications for terminal leave another year in which to file their claims.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, I notice this terminal leave date is June 30, 1951. There was some talk here, not from the well of the House, but from other parts of the House, that that date should be moved ahead, let us say, to January 1951. I was not in favor of that, because I thought we ought to give the veterans the full time to June 30, 1951. This terminal date calls to mind a point which I would like to make in answer to the gentleman who spoke about the cotton, the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. HARE], that is, the farmer prospers, then everybody prospers. I have heard that argument ever since I came here.

The first time I heard it was from the Townsendites who wanted $200 a month for pensions. Their argument was that if we gave every person over a certain age $200 a month, everyone would be prosperous. A fellow would get $200 a month, and his wife $200, and they would spend that money every month. In fact, there was one provision in one bill that the money must be spent in the current month. That would grease the old machinery and start it going and keep it going. It would be sort of a revolving fund. Too bad that instead of giving our own old people something we gave the billions to folks abroad.

I recall when some of us did not want subsidies. We were fearful we would sell ourselves into Government control. You gentlemen on that side are getting Government money for peanuts, tobacco, cotton—oh, everything, I guess, that you grow there in the South. If you have overlooked anything, it was because of a mistake. You put on subsidies with the result, the natural and inevitable result, that you have plenty of the subsidized crop. Yes; too much of it. Billions of dollars' worth of potatoes, eggs; at times too much butter, cheese, dried milk. We had eggs in the North, and I guess corn and wheat—I do not know what all. Apples and pears to some extent. Little pigs and old sows. Everybody received a payment—all to boost the ability to spend—and those who received the payments were expected to vote right. Some did, to their sorrow.

Now you got just exactly what you might have expected you would get. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. BECKWORTH], a very fine young man, a good legislator, was speaking the other day. I know that when you started that legislation you thought you were going to help your farmers. There was no doubt about that. But every time you put on a subsidy then some time or other you must have controls. If you do not, everybody goes into the business that is profitable. Now, what you cotton gentlemen from the South and the gentleman from California, yelling your heads off here because there are controls on cotton——

Mr. WHITE of California. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield? The gentleman mentioned my name.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Oh, I did not mention your name. I said the gentleman from California.

Mr. WHITE of California. Well, I am one of the gentleman from California.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. You are just one of many.

Mr. WHITE of California. That is right.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Some of my folks went out there to get in on that $100-a-month pension, or whatever, and then after they got out there, what did you do? You amended the law and fixed it so they could not get it. Now they are coming back to Michigan.

Mr. WHITE of California. Will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. I did yield.

Mr. WHITE of California. I am not objecting to controls. I am objecting to the gang that came in here from the gentleman's party——

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Oh, wait a minute. O Mr. Chairman, I cannot yield for anybody to be called a member of a gang not unless it is a goon squad which is rioting or beating up someone.

Mr. FISHER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. I yield.

Mr. FISHER. The gentleman has implied that the cotton farmers have been getting a subsidy.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Did they not get it?

Mr. FISHER. No.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Then I am mistaken again. You fellows must have fallen down on the job. That is what you intended to give them—call it what you will your cotton farmers got a payment or a price fixed on your cotton.

Mr. FISHER. Let me tell the gentleman something. This may really open the gentleman's eyes. The cotton program since its inception——

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for three additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

There was no objection.

Mr. FISHER. Will the gentleman let me finish my sentence? What I was trying to say when I was interrupted was that since the cotton program went into effect 13 years ago, instead of being in the form of a subsidy and a cost to the taxpayers, up to the 1st of July it has netted the Government $237,000,000 over and above operating expenses.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Income or outgo?

Mr. FISHER. Income.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. It has?

Mr. FISHER. Yes, indeed.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Well, I am glad of that, and if there was just more of it we might pay off the national debt. What?

I thought you fellows were for it because your farmers were getting the money. I did not know the cotton farmers were contributing more than $200,000,000 to balance the budget. But live and learn. You go back home and tell your constituents that what you got through was a law making your farmers pay more, and see whether you come back.

Now, you may laugh at that all you want, but this is a serious proposition. Every time you make payments of that kind to first one group and then another, then you later get control and regulation. My farmers were just so happy to get hold of these subsidies, but now they are yelling their heads off because they are being told what they can do—how many acres and planted to what. You get the dough, but you surrender the right to run your own business. A handout from the Government is a high price for the loss of one's freedom.

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Well, my time is not up yet. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. RANKIN] is going to tell us the cotton farmers are the poorest-paid men in the whole wide world; he only gets a half a cent an hour for the work that he puts in. I have heard it. No doubt it is true, the gentleman is accurate in his statements. You come in and visit with me almost twice a week and you have told me how hard up you are.

Mr. RANKIN. I have tried to educate the gentleman.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. And I have thanked the gentleman and to a certain extent you have succeeded. Of your sincerity and patriotism I have no doubt; nor of your ability, I might add.

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. I yield.

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. What the gentleman from Texas [Mr. FISHER] is saying is correct, about the Government showing a profit, but I want to point out, just to correct the gentleman's statement, that we have been shipping out two or three or four million bales of cotton a year that has been paid for by American taxpayers through the European recovery program, so the taxpayers have paid that money which makes it possible for the Commodity Credit Corporation to show a profit.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Of course I knew the taxpayers got gypped some way, but I did not know how. As I get it now the taxpayers finance the CCC which pays the cotton farmer for his crop a price which is higher than he would otherwise get. In the end everyone gets soaked for the cotton growers' benefit.

I yield back the balance of my time. I give the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. RANKIN] my extra minute.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Michigan has expired.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word, and I ask unanimous consent to speak out of order.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Mississippi?

There was no objection.

COMMUNISTIC FEPC BILL—RACIAL DISCRIMINATION—POWELL VERSUS ROOSEVELT

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Chairman, we have witnessed a most ridiculous performance here today over the so-called FEPC bill—the most dangerous piece of communistic legislation that has ever been proposed in the Congress of the United States.

I am not trying to reconcile the differences between the two Members who went at each other's throats this morning, Representatives POWELL and ROOSEVELT. I am like Carmack, I do not believe in attempting to weld a wooden handle to a pewter spoon.

I never try to graft a dead bough to a living trunk and make it blossom as the rose.

I never try to mix oil and water together placidly in the same bottle, or to make boon companions of a spider and a fly.

I agree with Brann, the great iconoclast, who said: "You cannot explain a dead cat out of the family cistern."

But here we are in this ridiculous position: The Member from New York [Mr. ROOSEVELT] cannot withdraw his petition; the other Member from New York, Representative POWELL, threatens to file a separate petition.

That would put every Member of Congress who favors this monstrosity on the spot. If he signs the Powell petition then the gentleman from New York [Mr. ROOSEVELT] can accuse you of discrimination because of race, creed, or color; if he signs the Roosevelt petition, then he can be accused of discriminating against the Member from New York, Representative POWELL, because of race, creed, or color.

So they have hit into a double play. It just shows the ridiculousness of the whole FEPC program.

I hope the House will take the hint and bury it so deep that it will never be heard of again.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the committee amendment.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

Mr. KILDAY. Mr. Chairman, I move that the Committee do now rise and report the bill back to the House with an amendment adopted in the Committee of the Whole, with the recommendation that the amendment be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the Committee rose; and Mr. PRIEST having assumed the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. HARRIS, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union, reported that that Committee, having had under consideration the bill (H. R. 3205) to provide a 1-year extension of the time for making application for terminal-leave pay, had directed him to report the bill back to the House with an amendment, with the recommendation that the amendment be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

Mr. KILDAY. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the bill and the amendment thereto to final passage.

The previous question was ordered.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill to provide an extension of the time for making application for terminal-leave pay."

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mrs. DOUGLAS (at the request of Mr. MCCORMACK, for 1 day, on account of illness.

To Mr. HELLER (at the request of Mr. MULTER), indefinitely, on account of illness.

To Mr. BROWN of Georgia (at the request of Mr. VINSON), indefinitely, on account of illness.

ADJOURNMENT

Mr. VINSON. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

By Mr. GREEN:

A resolution of the General Assembly of the State of Rhode Island; ordered to lie on the table:

"Resolution memorializing Congress with relation to the United States constitutional amendment on equal rights for women

"Whereas after years of effort and innumerable hearings, with never an unfavorable committee report and with strong recommendations for its passage, the equal-rights amendment to the United States Constitution has now reached the stage where its passage by Congress and submission to the States seems close at hand; and

"Whereas early in the first session of the present Congress, the Senate Judiciary Committee, composed wholly of lawyers, favorably reported the equal-rights amendment without a dissenting vote and presiding at this meeting was the chairman of the committee, Senator PAT MCCARRAN, and included among its members voting the favorable report, was Senator J. Howard McGrath, then chairman of the Democratic national committee, now United States Attorney General; and

"Whereas progress is truly being made; support for the cause has gained steadily since the amendment was first introduced in 1923: Now, therefore, be it

"Resolved, That the general assembly of the State of Rhode Island and Providence Plantations now goes on record in support of the submission of a United States constitutional amendment on equal rights for women which shall say:

" 'Equality of rights under the law shall not be denied or abridged by the United States or by any State on account of sex.

" 'Congress and the several States shall have the power, within their respective jurisdictions, to enforce this article by appropriate legislation.

" 'This amendment shall take effect 1 year after the date of ratification'; and the Senators and Representatives from Rhode Island in the Congress of the United States are earnestly requested to work for the passage of this constitutional amendment; and the secretary of state is hereby authorized and directed to transmit to said Senators and Representatives from Rhode Island duly certified copies of this resolution."

RURAL ELECTRIFICATION

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, there is now pending before the House Agricultural Committee a new bill, H. R. 6782, introduced by Representative TACKETT.

I have already heard from many rural-electrification cooperatives in my State who have expressed their deep concern over this legislation and their strenuous objection to it. I have in my hands, for example, a very fine message which I have received from my friend, Mr. R. L. Cleaves, of Cornell, Wis., manager of the Chippewa Valley Electric Cooperative. Another message comes in the form of a resolution from Mr. W. E. Rabe, secretary of the Dairyland Power Cooperative. I believe that this resolution will be of interest to my colleagues, and I ask unanimous consent that its brief text be printed in the RECORD at this point, and appropriately referred.

I have previously commented on the Senate floor on the vital role of rural electrification on the American agricultural scene, and the necessity for its continuation, so as to make sure that America's farmers maintain and improve a still higher standard of living which they so justly deserve for their hard labor.

There being no objection, the resolution was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

RESOLUTION ADOPTED BY THE BOARD OF DIRECTORS OF DAIRYLAND POWER COOPERATIVE FRIDAY, JANUARY 20, 1950

The board of directors of Dairyland Power Cooperative has given consideration to bill H. R. 6782, introduced by Congressman TACKETT on January 16, 1950, and to his press release issued in connection therewith.

We are firmly convinced that the passage of this bill would be against the best interests of farmers and rural electrification and should be unalterably opposed. The effect of this bill would be to cripple the right of farmers to generate their own power and to purchase cheap power Government-owned hydro developments.

We urge our Congressmen and Senators to oppose bill H. R. 6782.

PRESIDENT'S CIVIL-RIGHTS PROGRAM—RESOLUTION OF FAR ROCKAWAY DEMOCRATIC CLUB, NEW YORK

Mr. LEHMAN. Mr. President, I present for appropriate reference, and ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD, a resolution adopted by the Far Rockaway Democratic Club of New York, favoring the President's civil-rights program.

There being no objection, the resolution was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Whereas one of the foremost planks of the Democratic Party in the 1948 national elections consisted of the enactment of civil-rights legislation; and

Whereas the Honorable Harry S. Truman, President of these United States has repeatedly urged upon the Congress of the United States, passage of adequate civil-rights legislation; and

Whereas the Far Rockaway Democratic Club, in its campaign activities and support of the Democratic candidates for office, pledged itself to further the enactment of adequate measures of this kind, to the members of the community: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the Far Rockaway Democratic Club reiterates its support of the President's civil-rights program and urges upon the Representatives and Senators representing our community to support and assist the President of the United States in obtaining the passage of H. R. 4453 and S. 1728, more popularly known as the Fair Employment Practices Commission law, together with any other measures of the President's program that may come before the Congress; and be it further Resolved, That a copy of this resolution be forwarded to all the Members of Congress from this district together with a copy to William M. Boyle, Jr., Chairman of the Democratic National Committee.

Respectfully submitted.

WILLIAM KATZ,
President.
MARTIN STECHER,
Recording Secretary.

THE FAR EAST—RESOLUTION OF MANCHESTER (N. H.) YOUNG REPUBLICANS

Mr. TOBEY. Mr. President, I present for appropriate reference, and ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD, a resolution adopted by the Manchester (N. H.) Young Republicans, relating to conditions in the Far East.

There being no objection, the resolution was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Resolved, That the Manchester Young Republicans denounces the present policy of passive retreat in the Far East and places itself on record as favoring the taking of affirmative steps by the executive branch of our Government, pursuant to appropriate legislative mandate, to help hold the line against communism by holding the island of Formosa through whatever means may become necessary, including but not limited to the use of United States naval protection, and United States military advisers to the Chinese Nationalist Government on Formosa as necessary. This association condemns the appeasement and retreat which has characterized our foreign policy in China since General (Ambassador) Hurley resigned in the fall of 1945. The association finds ordinary people in this vicinity overwhelmingly in favor of helping hold Formosa, and notes with amazement the apparent refusal of the President of the United States and of the Secretary of State to carry out this obvious will of our people; and be it further

Resolved, That copies of the foregoing resolution be sent forthwith to the President of the United States, to the Secretary of State, to the Governor of this State, to the New Hampshire congressional delegation, to the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, to the Clerk of the House of Representatives, and to the Secretary of the United States Senate.

TRIBUTE TO GEN. DOUGLAS MacARTHUR ON HIS SEVENTIETH BIRTHDAY ANNIVERSARY

Mr. O'CONOR. Mr. President, with our Nation called upon to play such a vital part in world affairs today, I believe it appropriate to call to the attention of this distinguished body the fact that today marks the seventieth birthday of one who has made a most remarkable contribution in the field of foreign relations, both throughout the critical days of World War II and in the years of world confusion resulting therefrom. During a portion of his illustrious career his official headquarters and his private residence were in the State of Maryland.

History records few parallels, if, indeed, there is any, to the extraordinary achievements of Gen. Douglas MacArthur during the past decade. As a military commander throughout the Pacific campaigns he was both an outstanding leader and a symbol of hope to our own people as well as to our allies. In the crucial postwar period, and down to the present day, as Administrator and Chief for the Allied Powers in Japan, he has had to cope with political and economic problems of the utmost complexity. As evidence of his capabilities, it need only be recalled that he has continued to administer affairs in Japan successfully over a period which has witnessed continual shifts and changes in policy and leadership in other areas where American interests were involved.

At a time of life when the average man is seeking relief from arduous duties which tax both his mental and physical resources, General MacArthur has continued to discharge his official responsibilities with never a thought or suggestion that he be relieved of the task to which he has so ardently dedicated himself.

On this seventieth anniversary of his birth General MacArthur richly merits the many expressions of appreciation and admiration which will be showered upon him for his valorous leadership in war and his intelligent handling of the complex questions of peace. In this tribute to his accomplishments I am sure millions of his fellow countrymen in every section of our land will gladly join, and in their behalf I voice to General MacArthur the sincere regard and respect which he has so well earned.

May divine providence accord him the fullness of time necessary to complete his appointed task, and to enjoy, thereafter, many years of fruitful life, enriched by the inner satisfaction that can be his, of a task well performed.

TRIBUTE TO CHARLES ALDEN

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a statement I have prepared in tribute to a fine employee of the Senate and his half century of service.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

A TRIBUTE TO A FINE EMPLOYEE OF THE UNITED STATES SENATE AND HIS HALF CENTURY OF SERVICE

Mr. President, on Wednesday, January 25, I spoke on the floor of the Senate on the subject of a truly great American known to us all, Gen. Douglas MacArthur, who yesterday observed his seventieth birthday.

Today, Mr. President, I should like to say a few words in tribute to another fine American—an individual whom comparatively very few folks know, but who I think symbolizes the finest in public service. This individual on this coming Sunday, January 29, will celebrate the fiftieth anniversary of his coming to work for the United States Senate—the golden wedding, so to speak, of his service. Yes, on January 29, 1900, Mr. Charles Alden went to work for Senator Foraker, of Ohio. Since then and even prior to then, he has served ably, diligently, and loyally to various Members of the United States Senate and House of Representatives.

HONORING ALL CONGRESSIONAL EMPLOYEES

It may seem a bit strange that I take even these few moments of the time of the Senate to comment on this single employee. But I think that there is a larger meaning to Charlie Alden's half century of service to the Congress. And I feel that we, as Senators, would be remiss indeed if we did not express our public appreciation to Charlie and to all the other grand workers in the Capitol, in the Senate and House Office Buildings who patiently, anonymously, devotedly perform their duties for the United States Government.

Charlie has now reached the ripe young age of 77, having been born on August 27, 1872. The years have given him the type of wholesome, genial philosophy from which every man can benefit. There is always a genuine smile on his face, sincere courtesy in his manner, warm consideration in his actions. He is young in spirit, young in heart, and the whiteness of his hair merely reflects the passing of time, but definitely not the passing of vitality, alertness, and a keen appreciation of life's true values.

He is a man of many talents and many interests. Away back in 1905 he organized a string quartet which meets every Tuesday to this day with Charlie alternating on the stringed instruments. Every job he has tackled he has done well, and he is living proof of the fact that a humble job, greatly performed, is a great job.

EVERY LEGISLATOR NEEDS AN EFFICIENT TEAM

No man who has observed at close hand the operations of the United States Government, including the Congress, the Supreme Court, and the executive branch, can help but notice that every individual in high public office must have an efficient, hard-working team with him, if he is to be adequate to his responsibilities. This is particularly true of the Congress, whose responsibilities have multiplied a hundredfold in this generation and whose committee staffs, office employees, building workers, official reporters, etc., are an indispensable element in a smooth functioning legislative branch.

Only an ungrateful Government or an ungrateful Congress would fail to note that fact. We, however, are indeed grateful and are sincerely appreciative of Charlie Alden and all the fine things he symbolizes. His work embodies the true concept that "public office is a public trust" and this goes for all those folks associated with public office.

To complete my comments, I ask unanimous consent that there be printed a brief summary of Charlie's work. We hope that in his many, many additional years of service, he will find the continuing fulfillment of the poet's words: "Grow old with me, the best is yet to be." Although his dear wife passed on 8 years ago, Charlie's life is rich in activity, in friends, and in golden memories.

Happy anniversary of service, Charlie, good luck, good wishes, and Godspeed to you.

SUMMARY OF CHARLES ALDEN'S SERVICE

During the years 1897 and 1899, worked on House side for Congressman Hooker, New York; Ward, New York; Southwick, New York; O'Grady, New York; Heatwole, Minnesota.

Also did extra work for Senators Wilson, of Washington, and Martin of Virginia.

In December, 1899, was employed as an amanuensis in the Senate Official Reporter's room.

On January 29, 1900, went to work for Senator Foraker, of Ohio, as assistant clerk to Committee on Pacific Islands & Puerto Rico, of which Foraker was chairman, and became clerk and his secretary the following year. Was with him until he left in March, 1909.

Secretary to Senator Aldrich of Rhode Island for 1 year, having previously served for 2 years as assistant clerk of the Finance Committee.

Secretary to Senator Page, of Vermont, for 5 years and of Oddie, of Nevada, for 8 years.

Custodian of Senate Office Building from 1929 to 1933, and has remained in that branch of work to this time—February 1950.

DECENTRALIZATION OF GOVERNMENT OPERATIONS

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a statement I have prepared relative to the necessity for the decentralization of Government operations.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

GOVERNMENT MUST DECENTRALIZE ITS OPERATIONS RIGHT NOW, PARTICULARLY FROM WASHINGTON, D. C.

Mr. President, the morning's paper contains a confirmation of a warning which I have addressed to my colleagues for many years now, particularly since the discovery of the atomic bomb. Testifying before the House Armed Services Committee, Defense Chiefs yesterday presented once more the ominous fact that the Nation's Capital "would probably be a high priority target" in the event of a third world war. Gen. Omar Bradley stated very clearly that in the event of another war, "he could imagine conditions under which there might be several months' delay in convening Congress."

Obviously, every potential aggressor has learned this lesson from two World Wars: No power can control Europe, if it gives the United States sufficient time to mobilize its tremendous industrial and military establishment to launch a counter offensive. That means that every major industrial center of our country would become a ripe target in the first minute of war, and it means, in particular, that Washington, D. C., as the central nervous system of our entire defense effort, would have number one priority.

Gen. Lawton Collins, Army Chief of Staff, stated yesterday:

"We cannot rule out the possibility that aerial attacks may be launched against our cities in a future war."

That is certainly a masterful understatement of the case. The Atomic Energy Commission in its previous report on the danger to Washington, D. C., advised us many months ago of the horrible destruction that a single atomic bomb bursting on or above Washington, D. C., could cause.

PANIC OR HYSTERIA ARE NOT THE ANSWERS

Now, Mr. President, the answer to this situation is not a feeling of hysteria or panic or morbid fear. Obviously, we have a splendid chance of maintaining the peace, if we redouble our effort through the United Nations and if we maintain the strongest possible armed forces set-up. At the same time, we dare not risk the possibility of another Pearl Harbor in the form of a blitz attack against our Nation's Capital.

For years now, I have exchanged correspondence, phone calls, and visits with the White House, with the National Security Resources Board, with the United States Bureau of the Budget, and with other Government agencies involved in this decentralization problem. I have pleaded for the immediate decentralization of all high priority Government agencies from our congested Nation's Capital. I refer, in particular, to the key units of the National Defense Department, to the Atomic Energy Commission, and to the other vital units.

Obviously, if an atomic bomb were to strike Washington, D. C., Congress could not meet because there would be no Capitol, and if the attack were to take place during a legislative session, there would be no Congress to meet in the first place.

MOSCOW RADIO DENOUNCED MY DEFENSE PLEA

For years now, so-called wise guys have sneered at the warnings which others and I have presented to our people. These wise guys have sat smugly on their false dignity, deriding such talk as "Buck Rogerish" nonsense. Moreover, the Moscow radio made a specific point of denouncing me because I had warned my Nation to be on guard against such an atomic emergency.

Mr. President, the Moscow radio is not in business for nothing. It does not attack any individual or any idea unless it feels that the world-wide revolutionary purposes of the Kremlin are involved. I wish that our own Government and our own people were as keenly aware of the facts in this situation as the Politburo and as the Moscow radio are aware.

CONGRESS' COMMITTEES SHOULD DECENTRALIZE BUREAUS UNDER THEIR REVIEW

I urge my colleagues, therefore, in their respective committees to evaluate the situation and to see that the Government agencies under their particular jurisdiction cease the suicidal overcentralization of personnel in the Nation's Capital, and begin to reverse the trend away from centralization. What is true of Washington, D. C., is also true of such congested centers as New York, Chicago, Philadelphia, etc., all of which are ripe for an atomic attack.

I urge the Defense Department, moreover, to quit concentrating on merely talking to Congress about this emergency and to start doing something about it; start moving key defense offices from the Pentagon.

THE CONGRESS OF THE UNITED STATES

Mr. THYE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD as part of my remarks a brief editorial entitled "It's Our Own Congress," which appeared in the January 14 issue of the Minneapolis Morning Tribune. I hope all Senators will read it, and, in doing so, feel that it represents the attitude of the thinking people of a great State toward the Members of the United States Senate and likewise our colleagues in the House of Representatives.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

IT'S OUR OWN CONGRESS

As the new session gets under way it is well to remember that Congress, for all its frailties and faults, consists largely of conscientious Americans who are trying to do a good job according to their lights. The tendency to hold Congress up to ridicule, and to impugn its sincerity and good faith at every opportunity, is not a wholesome one, in our opinion.

There are, to be sure, charlatans and demagogues in every legislative body, but we should be careful not to judge the whole by its least admirable parts. Congress is a product of the American system of representative government, and the chronic scoffers at Congress are in effect belittling and deriding that system.

Selective criticism of Congress is proper and desirable, but steady sniping for the sake of sniping is a bad habit. In the last analysis, the American people are responsible for Congress, and regardless of the party controlling it, it remains a symbol of some of our best American traditions.

EXTENSION OF TERMS OF CERTAIN PATENTS OF PERSONS WHO SERVED IN MILITARY OR NAVAL FORCES

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a message from the House of Representatives announcing its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 4692) to provide for the extension of the term of certain patents of persons who served in the military or naval forces of the United States during World War II and requesting a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Mr. McCARRAN. I move that the Senate insist upon its amendment, agree to the request of the House for a conference, and that the Chair appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The motion was agreed to; and the Vice President appointed Mr. EASTLAND, Mr. O'CONOR, and Mr. WILEY conferees on the part of the Senate.

PROPOSED CHANGE IN METHOD OF ELECTION OF PRESIDENT AND VICE PRESIDENT

The Senate resumed the consideration of the resolution (S. J. Res. 2) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States providing for the election of President and Vice President.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, I send to the desk an amendment, in the nature of a substitute, to Senate Joint Resolution 2, and ask that it be printed and lie on the table.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HOEY in the chair). The amendment will be received, printed, and lie on the table.

RETURN OF PROPERTIES HELD BY ALIEN PROPERTY CUSTODIAN

Mr. LANGER. Mr. President, 2 days ago, I introduced a bill in the nature of an amendment to the Trading With the Enemy Act. The bill provides for the return of properties held by the Alien Property Custodian. I introduced the bill in my own behalf and in behalf of the junior Senator from Maryland [Mr. O'CONOR] and the Senators from Nebraska [Mr. BUTLER and Mr. WHERRY]. I find that the bill has not yet been printed, and therefore has not been distributed. But I wish very briefly to state why it was introduced.

Mr. President, I believe it will surprise all Senators when I state that the Alien Property Custodian still has in his custody millions of dollars' worth of assets remaining from World War I. That office has had charge of those millions upon millions upon millions of dollars' worth of assets; and up to the present time the office of the Alien Property Custodian has not even returned the property or disposed of it, but still has actual custody of it. That situation was testified to only a short time ago by the Alien Property Custodian.

The bill I have introduced is in the nature of an amendment to the Trading With the Enemy Act. I have introduced the bill in behalf of the three other Senators I have named, as well as myself. The present act provides for the return of property vested in the Alien Property Custodian to German nationals—and by "German," I mean nationals of Rumania, Estonia, Poland, and many other countries, as well as Germany—provided they were subject to political, racial, or religious persecution, amounting to a denial of their rights of citizenship. Under this law, to my knowledge, no properties have been returned by the Alien Property Custodian to German nationals. Property has been returned by the Custodian's office to certain German charitable and religious institutions and, of course, to residents and former residents of Germany who lost their citizenship by the Hitler decrees.

We have here in the United States, Mr. President, many millions of good citizens who emigrated to our country from Germany, Austria, and other central European countries. They are found in every field of endeavor. They are farmers, laborers, craftsmen, in business, and in the professions. The greater majority have been good and faithful American citizens, as testified to by their record and the record of their sons and daughters in the service of the United States during the recent war.

These people have next of kin in Germany. They have there mothers, fathers, sisters, brothers, cousins, friends of their school days or preschool days. In many cases, these American citizens, realizing that the terrible aftermath of the war, with the total defeat of Hitler, would bring great suffering and misery to their relatives and friends, tried to provide for them. Those who felt that they would continue to live are providing for them today, but those who were getting older and who knew they only had a short time to live tried to provide for their kin by making wills.

The property thus provided by these American citizens, through their own industry and hard work and thrift, was American property, created by American citizens. It was not Nazi property or property of German nationals, but German nationals received only an interest in that property upon the death of that American citizen, by will, through bequest or devise, in trust, or otherwise, or by gifts in contemplation of death and the like.

To make the matter clear, Mr. President, let me state the case of a man of German ethnic origin, who lived in Montana, and had lived in the United States for 50 years. Perhaps his sons had served in the United States Army in both World Wars. If that man had living in the old country a brother who hated Hitler and figured that Hitler was leading Germany to ruin, the American citizen living in Montana might well say to himself, "I have made considerable money in Montana. I am going to make a will or bequest or devise. I am going to leave $100 a month so that my brother in Germany"—or Austria, or Rumania, or one of the other central European countries—"will not be hungry, because, after all, he is my brother."

Now what has happened, Mr. President? Our Government has divested not only the ownership of the property formerly in the name of German nationals, but has taken the property of American citizens simply because they were unfortunate enough to have relatives or kin in Germany, Austria, or some of the other countries to which I have referred. Our Government has taken it away from them.

Since the end of the war, American citizens of German birth have made untold sacrifices to assuage the hunger and need of their kin in Germany. For instance, in the month of October a year ago they shipped 41,000,000 pounds of food and clothing to Germany and to Austria. I might call the attention of the Senate to the fact that we have in the United States 33,000,000 of such Americans of German ethnic origin, including many leaders in the Army and the Navy, and leaders in the arts and the sciences. The very man who designed the dome of this Capitol Building was one of them. The man who designed the Library of Congress was another of them. The man who built the post office next to the Union Station was one of them. There are others, including Eisenhower, Spaatz, Willkie, Stassen, whose names I need not mention.

Many of them were no more responsible for Hitler and the Nazi Party than you, Mr. President, or I. There have been to the best of my knowledge, approximately 10,000 estates in the United States, throughout the 48 States, in which American citizens of German birth left sums of money to help their relatives and friends in the old country, and in many of these cases they did so, even though they had children in the United States. They thus decreased the amount that they left to their own families in order to help their other kin in the old country. And now that the United States Government has taken the properties which, under the circumstances mentioned, an American citizen may have left to his mother, or to his father, or to his other kin in a foreign country, an extra burden is placed upon the surviving members of the family in America.

Except for the fact that that good American citizen, father or mother, who died had such great faith in the United States of America, other arrangements which the United States Government could not stop would have been made. A father could have called in his son and said, "John, grandma is in dire straits," or "Aunt Susie is in dire straits in Germany. I want to take care of her. If I make a will and give her $500, then the United States Government will take it away. Therefore, I am going to give an extra $500 or an extra $1,000 to you so that you will be able to take care of her."

He could have done that, but he did not do it because he had faith and confidence in the fairness of the United States Government, he believed that the United States Government would hold inviolate his right to dispose of his property by devise or bequest, or by gift in contemplation of death, where the transfer could not aid the enemy and could not be made until hostilities came to an end.

American people of German extraction throughout the United States feel that a distinction should be made between properties which represented investments by German nationals in corporations in the United States, or patents and copyrights owned by German nationals, and property rights that came into being from American citizens. I want to make that very clear. I am not talking about money sent into the United States by German nationals. I am not talking about patents secured by German citizens residing in the United States. I am talking about American citizens of German ethnic origin, 33,000,000 of them, some of whose forefathers had come to this country 150 years previously. They wanted to take care of relatives in Europe who were against Hitler and who fought Hitler and were opposed to everything he stood for. They wanted to take care of their relatives by a little remembrance in a will or by a devise, leaving an estate that would produce, let us say, $100 a month. American citizens of German extraction throughout the United States feel that a distinction should be made between the kinds of property I have mentioned.

I know of one case—and there are many more like it—where a young man emigrated from Germany to the United States shortly before we entered the war. He had only a mother living in Germany. He intended to become a good American citizen and then bring his mother to the United States. The war broke out and he joined our armed forces. He was killed in action fighting for the United States, but the little property he left and his insurance were taken by the United States Government, and his poor mother, who was the beneficiary and his sole heir, was left in dire straits, simply because she happened to be a resident of Germany.

Under the present law she cannot receive his inheritance, or his insurance, unless she, as an old lady, can prove that she was denied substantial rights of citizenship by the Nazis. It is not enough for her to prove that the Nazis made her life miserable because she had a son fighting in the United States Army. It is not enough that she might have been discriminated against in the giving out of food rations. It is not enough for her to prove that she was taken from her home and the home turned over to Nazis. The way the law reads today she practically had to be in a concentration camp in order to qualify for a return of the property to her.

There are in the United States thousands of cases of American citizens who, as far back as 1920 and 1925, in the early thirties, before Hitler, provided in their wills for trust arrangements whereby certain small sums would be paid to needy relatives in Germany. Even these trusts were vested by the Alien Property Custodian, and not only was the income taken but the entire trust was taken. Surely that American citizen who was the testator had no intention of helping Hitler or the Nazis. He only wanted to eliminate and alleviate human suffering and to help the needy.

Our Government set a cut-off date after which the interest of German nationals would no longer be vested by the United States. That cut-off date was January 1, 1947, 1¾ years after the end of hostilities in Germany. In other words, if an American citizen, with relatives in Germany, was unfortunate enough to have died at 11 p. m. on December 31, 1946, the small interest he might have provided in his will for his relatives in Germany would be taken by the United States Government. However, if he had good doctors who could have kept him alive until 1 a. m. January 1, 1947, the United States Government would not take what he provided in his will or what might have gone to his next of kin by the laws of descent and distribution. Anyone can see how unfair that is.

The amendment to the act which is here proposed provides that return of the property may be made by the United States Government in cases where the interest of the German national in the property arose through gift, devise, bequest, or the laws of descent and distribution in the estate of an American citizen, provided that the German national was not a member of the Nazi Party. This amendment should be made in justice to American citizens who have passed on and to their next of kin in this country who have assumed the burdens of their deceased relatives here to take care of their kin in the old country.

The amendment to the act would not only secure inheritances to German nationals, but it would also secure them for nationals of other enemy countries in central Europe, such as Hungary, Bulgaria, and Rumania.

The amendment further provides that where an American citizen is the successor in interest to the European national such American citizen could secure for himself the property taken by the Alien Property Custodian. For example, if an American citizen left a certain sum to relatives in Germany and that sum was taken by the Alien Property Custodian, and thereafter the person in Europe died, leaving a will, or by intestacy—it makes no difference—leaving his property to an American citizen, such American citizen should be entitled to have the property returned to him as successor in interest.

There are many American citizens in the United States whose relatives here provided for their mutual relatives in the old country. The provisions for their relatives in the old country fell with the taking of the property by the custodian. This amendment would permit the American citizen, as successor in interest, as heir at law, or as devisee or legatee, to take that interest.

Mr. President, I respectfully suggest that the appropriate committee take this amendment and give it very prompt and immediate attention, so that the American citizens who are anxious to get their property back may get it back at the very earliest opportunity.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill has heretofore been referred to the appropriate committee.

WARNINGS IN LIQUOR ADS—ARTICLE BY W. LOWRIE KAY

Mr. LANGER. Mr. President, there is another serious matter which I wish to discuss. I ask unanimous consent that in the RECORD it may appear under the heading "Warnings in liquor ads."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. LANGER. Mr. President, a few days ago there was a hearing on Senate bill 1847, introduced by me, to prevent the advertising of liquor in newspapers, over the radio, and by television, in interstate commerce. I have here an article entitled "Warnings in Liquor Ads—The Wide Horizon," written by W. Lowrie Kay, which appeared on January 21, 1950, in the Christian Science Monitor. It is an article which I believe every Senator should read. It brings to the attention of the Senate and, I believe, to the attention of the Department of Justice, a statute which has not been enforced apparently up to the present time, and which will make the passage of the bill which I introduced unnecessary. The article is as follows:

A heart-warming and challenging interpretation of provisions of the Federal Trade Commission Act covering false advertising was offered in Washington, January 12, during Senate hearings on the Langer bill. If accepted and enforced, the interpretation would have broad consequences in the advertising of alcoholic beverages. It should promote temperance and abstinence.

Advertisements of alcoholic drinks would be required to warn consumers of the consequences of using the product—such as possible addiction, intoxication, or illness. The warning statements would be compulsory to prevent the advertisements from being misleading in a material respect.

William N. Plymat, Des Moines lawyer and insurance executive, read before Senator MAGNUSON'S committee section 315 of the act, dealing with misleading advertising which is illegal in interstate commerce as an unfair method of competition. The section is explicit.

I submit, Mr. President, that the present law has been ignored, just as has been the Sherman Antitrust Act. The Sherman Antitrust Act was passed in 1891, nearly 60 years ago. It particularly provides that where a group of persons get together in order to raise the price of a commodity, so as to establish a monopoly, they can be put in jail for 1 year. There have been Republican Attorneys General and Democratic Attorneys General since that act was passed, but not a single person has ever been put in jail under that provision. Yet Eugene Debs was put in jail for violating an injunction.

We find another case, Mr. President, and I submit that law has not been enforced. Of course, under the antitrust statutes, if a soldier came home from World War II and found his family hungry, and he could not get a job, and he stole three or four loaves of bread, he would be put in jail; but if four or five men get together and raise the price of bread, the price of ice cream, or the prices of other food products, so that widows and orphans cannot afford to buy them, they would not be put in jail. They might receive diplomatic posts. One of them might be sent as Ambassador to Argentina, as was Mr. Bruce a while ago.

I read further from this article:

"In determining whether any advertisement is misleading," the act says, "there shall be taken into account (among other things) not only representations made by suggested statement, word, design, devise, sound, or any combination thereof, but also the extent to which the advertisement fails to reveal facts material in the light of such representations or material with respect to consequences which may result from the use of the commodity to which the advertisement relates under the conditions prescribed in said advertisements, or under such conditions as are customary or usual."

That beer, whisky and certain other beverages contain alcohol is an established fact. Mr. Plymat holds illegal, under the act, advertising of such products which "fails to reveal facts material, * * * with respect to consequences which may result from the use of the commodity." At one stroke, he indicts all such advertisements which cross State lines.

Care is taken by manufacturers of combustible products to warn users regarding possible results, the products being described as "inflammable" or "explosive." Not only is such information required by law, but it is a precaution in the interest of public and personal safety.

That the manufacturer and advertiser of a beverage containing alcohol, itself inimical to both personal and public welfare and safety, may boldly advertise his product without warning of the consequence of its use, and yet escape prosecution under the Trade Commission Act, is a matter of public concern. Surely the Des Moines' lawyer's interpretation is sufficiently valid to warrant at least a test case in the Federal courts.

A striking point in Mr. Plymat's testimony was his pinioning of alcoholic-beverage advertisements slanted to create new customers. Many such customers, he pointed out, are youths who are unaware of the disastrous results of drinking these products. To them especially is owed the duty of complying with the act's provision against failing to reveal material facts.

Were the Trade Commission Act enforced in this manner in interstate advertising of alcoholic beverages, there would be less need for the Langer bill—successor to the Capper bill. The proposed legislation would forbid all interstate advertising of liquor—a step beyond requiring warning of consequence of its use.

To publish warnings within the advertisements themselves would, however, serve a good purpose. It would not be surprising if some readers would promptly come to the logical conclusion, why, if the beverage is so potentially harmful that the law requires a warning, should it be used at all? If an alcohol beverage is capable of producing intoxication, illness, or addiction, why go to bat with two strikes on themselves?

Mr. President, I hope the subcommittee of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce which is considering this question will report to the full committee and that within a short time the bill will be brought to the floor of the Senate so that we may have a chance to vote on it.

Mr. President, I now desire to refer to another matter.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from North Dakota has the floor.

THE SITUATION CONFRONTING THE MINING INDUSTRY

Mr. LANGER. Mr. President, I wish to discuss an article appearing in the November 1949 issue of the Mining Congress Journal, entitled "Going, Going, Gone!" It is a very interesting article, and it reads as follows:

In May 1948 we questioned "Must Mercury Die?" Since then inaction at home and revaluation of foreign exchange have given this vital metal-mining industry a further push down the road to oblivion. A few operations cling on doggedly in the hope that some last minute action may revitalize them. In the meantime, one principal producer is mining its shaft pillars and another plans to follow suit in the spring.

I call this to the attention of every Democrat in this Chamber, Mr. President, because it relates to the action of the Democratic Party. The fur industry has already been ruined. The mining industry is now being ruined, and if the Democrats are not careful they will ruin the farming industry. I read further from the article:

Evidence was shown in these columns in June 1948 that tungsten was next on the list for tough sledding and possible exclusion from the roster of domestic metal mining industries. Revaluation speeded up the patient's decline when the price of foreign tungsten ores dropped to $18.50 to $19.50 per short ton unit of WO_3, a price which no domestic mine can meet and still realize a profit.

Immediately following revaluation, the price of antimony plummeted almost overnight from 40⅜ to 26 cents per pound, with extensive offerings at this low figure.

An obvious result of the absence of a policy protecting these industries is complete dependence on Spain, Italy, and Yugoslavia for mercury; on Communist China, Korea, and Bolivia for tungsten; and similar uncertain sources for antimony.

We have long depended upon the Philippines, Turkey, and Africa for chromium and upon Russia, Africa, and India for manganese, two other minerals equally important to national defense.

Why no positive policy has been developed to prevent utter dependence on foreign sources we know not. Without adequate supplies of these five metals we cannot fight a war, and yet if these mines finally close it may well take as much as 4 years to again reach maximum production—far too long in this atomic age. A healthy nucleus of production should be maintained in order to perfect the techniques for utilizing marginal or subeconomic resources so they may serve in an emergency. If this basic policy is not implemented, and another emergency arises, the economy doctors that dismembered these strategic metal-producing industries will have some unburied corpses to explain.

I say, again, that I call the matter to the particular attention of the Democratic Party, because that party is to blame for the fact that today every mercury mine in America is closed. Practically every tungsten mine is closed, and the antimony mines are going to be closed within a short time. I wonder if the average Senator realizes that this country was very seriously handicapped by the lack of tungsten, and if it had not been for the fact that in Idaho, at about the time of the beginning of the war, tungsten was discovered, with the result that approximately 92 percent of all the tungsten we had in this country was produced in the State of Idaho, we would have been in a very bad situation. Enough was produced to keep us going. If it had not been for that fact, we would have had to import from Africa every single ton we used.

Mr. President, it is my purpose now to discuss the so-called Brannan plan.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from North Dakota has the floor.

THE BRANNAN PLAN FOR AGRICULTURE

Mr. LANGER. Mr. President, there is another subject which I wish to discuss at this time. I refer to the so-called Brannan plan for agriculture.

Mr. President, when Congress convened I had just returned from a 2 months' trip through the United States. I understand that a great many other Senators went to Europe. Some of them went to China. I felt that I could do more good here in the United States than by chasing to any foreign country. Very humbly and most respectfully, I suggest to my colleagues that they would be doing a much better job for their constituents by remaining in the United States and taking care of the 150,000,000 people in the United States than by chasing all over the world trying to promote the idea of 7 percent of the people saving the other 93 percent.

I found to my surprise that approximately half of the Senators whom I interrogated had never even been in North Dakota, but they had been all over Europe, visiting the crowned heads over there, dining and wining and being entertained by them, going from one country to another, visiting the rulers. As a matter of fact, they do not understand their own country at all.

When it comes to agriculture, I found as I went along that the people of this country did not thoroughly understand what is known as the Brannan plan. Let me say first of all that both the Republican and Democratic Parties, whenever they want the farmer's vote, when they want the votes of the farmers in the dairy State of Wisconsin, when they want the vote of the wheat-producing farmer in the Northwest, say what a great friend they are of the farmer.

Not only in 1948, 1944, and 1940, but in times past, the platforms of both parties have said that they stand for absolute parity, absolute equality, between agriculture, industry, and labor. That statement is found in all the platforms. I have them before me.

What is the situation today? Take my own State of North Dakota. In the first 9 months of this year our farmers received $131,930,000 less for their products than they received during the first 9 months last year. What I say about my State holds true all over the United States because the farmer's income has decreased approximately one-third. It is true in Oklahoma; it is true in Tennessee; it is true in Wisconsin. If the farmers in North Dakota had received the $131,930,000 which they received the previous year, who would get the benefit of it? The businessmen. The farmers can buy more radios, more automobiles, more luxuries of life than they can buy if they have not got those $131,930,000.

So it seems to me that the businessmen ought to be just as much interested as the farmer, if not more so, in seeing that the platforms of the Republican and Democratic Parties are carried out.

What is the situation today? I repeat, the Republican and Democratic platforms say that they stand for equality and parity between agriculture, industry, and labor. Labor has already had three increases in wages, and is asking for a fourth increase. Wages have gone up, and up, and up.

What about industry? The other day the United States Steel Corp. raised the price of steel $4 a ton. The steel industry has continually increased the price of steel. Steel is the barometer of industry. As a matter of fact, the price of steel has dropped only 4 percent since the war ended. After World War I, as every Senator knows—and this is the pattern that is now being followed—the price of wheat dropped from almost $3 a bushel to 20 cents a bushel. However, the price of farm machinery which the farmer had to buy did not drop a single index point. All that the farm-machinery companies had to do was to get together and agree not to manufacture a surplus.

But the farmer is not in such a fortunate position. He has his farm, his land, and he must do something with it. He must raise a crop. He has his money invested in the land and he must do something with it. The result was that there was a surplus. The price of wheat dropped from nearly $3 a bushel to 20 cents, and we had a terrible depression.

During the past few summers as I went along through many States, including the Northwestern States as far as the Pacific coast, and down south in Texas, I visited practically every State except the New England States. I found that people knew nothing about the Brannan plan. I would walk into a banker's office and find that all that the banker knew about the Brannan plan was that he was against it. When asked what it was, he did not know any more about it than I know about what kind of food Julius Caesar ate. But the bankers were against it. They were against it because the big-business interests and the newspapers were against it.

When I asked them what the law provided for they did not know. They had no idea. I received petitions from clubwomen saying that they were against the Brannan plan because it was socialistic. When they asked me if I would send them a copy of it, I found that they had not even read it.

Being a Republican Senator, I decided thoroughly to educate the people and to advise with any of my colleagues who may wish to consult with me relative to the Brannan plan. One thing is certain, and that is that until the term of the present President of the United States expires, he is going to name the Secretary of Agriculture. One thing is as certain as that two and two make four, and that is that the Secretary of Agriculture will be a Democrat. It is as certain as that three and three make six that no agricultural law will be enacted which is not endorsed by the Secretary of Agriculture, appointed by a Democratic President.

The prices of farm products are already down 33 or 34 percent and are still going down. The cost of labor is going up, and industry is making more and more money all the time. Both the Republican and the Democratic platforms state that they stand for equality and parity between agriculture, industry, and labor. In making my investigation of the Brannan plan, for which I declared myself, and which is the plan proposed by the Secretary of Agriculture, I decided to let the American people ask me questions, which I in turn could answer. The first question which they asked was, What is the so-called Brannan plan, which the newspaper columnists call one of the most significant questions before the Congress? My answer to that question is as follows:

Answer. The name "Brannan plan" has become attached to the administration's farm program, which is based upon the Secretary of Agriculture's recommendations for changes in our price-support system to adapt it more realistically to the needs and conditions of the present. It is no panacea or cure-all. It is a set of forward-looking principles which would help farmers to keep going ahead with their revolutionary progress of recent years. It is aimed at providing farm purchasing power with the realistic protection necessary to prevent farmers from bringing back the old and wasteful methods that add to the Nation's food bill the very real but hidden cost of resources lost through overworking our farms and our farm families.

The Brannan plan starts from the concept that there is a point below which it is in the public interest not to let farm purchasing power fall.

In other words, Mr. President, it carries out the platforms of the Republican and Democratic Parties. I repeat, Mr. President, the politicians want the farmer at election time. They woo him at election time; they say what a lovely man he is, and how much he does for the country. But the records show that just so soon as the election is over they forget about him until the next election, as proved by the fact, I repeat, that the prices the farmers receive for their products have already dropped one-third, while everything the farmers buy has gone up in price. Labor has received three wage increases and now wants a fourth, and is striking to obtain it.

I continue the answer to the first question:

It seeks to maintain that purchasing power more realistically by using an income objective as the standard for support prices, and would broaden our support system to extend such protection to perishable commodities producing three-fourths of our farm income instead of just the basic commodities producing only one-fourth of that income. It adds production payments to the present purchase and loan methods of supporting prices to the producer, so that the consumer need not be penalized by vast quantities of food being held off the market.

That is the answer to question 1. I may say, Mr. President, that I shall invite every Member of the Senate, and every Member of the House of Representatives, all 435 of them, to write me asking any questions they may want to about the Brannan plan, and I shall see to it that their questions are answered.

I come now to the second question the people of the ccuntry are asking. It is as follows:

Question No. 2: What is there about farming or agriculture which makes Congress continually treat it as a special subject as if it were the most important existing endeavor of mankind?

I may say that question is asked by many hundreds of people. It is asked by many who are receiving one wage increase after another. I am not talking, however, about the white-collar workers. Heaven knows they are starving. The white-collar class is worse off than the farmers. I am talking about persons who belong to unions, who have received three wage increases, and are asking for a fourth.

The answer to the second question is as follows:

Answer. The welfare of agriculture, as a basic productive industry, vitally affects the welfare of the rest of the Nation's economy.

Farmers are only asking economic justice, not special privilege. They are only seeking a fair share of the national income in proportion to what they contribute to that income.

As a matter of fact, the main reason agriculture does need Government intervention to achieve a fair position of equality with other groups is because these other groups have been given special legislative treatment in the past to upset the normal economic relation between groups. Industry, commerce, financial institutions, labor have all been given special protection at various times in our history, making similar action necessary for agriculture to restore the proper balance.

What did President Truman say to Congress in his last message relating to excise taxes? He called attention to the fact that in the oil industry an individual can make $1,000,000 a year, but does not have to pay any income tax on it. But the poor farmer, who may have had no crop for 3 or 4 or 5 or 6 years—and during the drought farmers did not have a crop for 9 years, I may say, Mr. President—the poor farmer who happens to have a good crop this year is soaked, he must pay an income tax on what he earns. The farmer is not permitted to offset his good years by his poor years. Yet in the oil industry, as President Truman stated in his message on excise taxes, a man may receive an income of a million dollars a year, and may receive such an income for five continuous years, and yet not be obliged to pay an income tax on it.

I continue my answer to question No. 2:

The city man has just as much stake in a sound farm economy as the farmer. Prosperity in the farm market always means more dollars in real wages in cities and towns. When farm purchasing power is up, industry and labor can count upon a steady market for the indispensable tools of an efficient agriculture—tractors and corn pickers, electric motors, milking machines, gasoline and oil, insecticides and weed killers, fertilizers and lime, and so on through all the assorted equipment and supplies needed in modern farming. The Nation would find itself strengthened to resist the paralysis of depression. We might discover little real need to use the support prices by which the plan would protect farm income.

But when farm prices start falling, like they are doing now, it's everybody's concern—not just the farmers. Because collapse of farm purchasing power can start the familiar old spiral into depression.

I think the entire thing was summed up pretty well last week by Representative CANNON, of Missouri, when he declared at a House Appropriations Committee hearing:

"You cannot burn down the kitchen where the farmer is working and expect the rest of the house to stand. Sooner or later the fire spreads to the parlor, where labor and industry and finance and transportation are sitting on the plush with their feet on the mantelpiece. If the kitchen burns, the parlor will burn with it."

I now come to question No. 3, which people ask me relative to the Brannan plan. I may repeat that the question has come to me from all over the country, and I say that the question will be answered correctly, so that the people will no longer be deceived as to what the Brannan plan really is. The third question which has been asked me is as follows:

Question No. 3: The United States has grown strong through the competitive enterprise system, where each individual can engage in the economic activity of his choice. Why cannot the farmer supply the experience and judgment necessary to make his enterprise function, and accept the risk of success or failure, the same as any other businessman?

This is the answer:

Answer. Farmers are confronted with many hazards entirely beyond their control that make agriculture's situation far different from that of any other business or industry. Most industries can quickly adjust themselves to changed conditions of supply and demand, shutting down almost overnight if products are in excess supply.

For example, if United States Steel, with all its manufacturing plants, produces too much steel, the corporation shuts down. A farmer cannot do that, because his land is his capital investment, and he is obliged to do something with it.

I continue to read my answer to question No. 3:

And when industry restricts production to maintain profitable prices, its heaviest fixed costs of labor and raw materials are cut proportionately. But not so with the farmer. Nature does not always cooperate. The farmer cannot adjust as quickly to necessity for change, and even when he does try to curtail production his fixed costs are relatively inflexible and continue high. He cannot fire his wife and children. Bumper crops and crop failures are often the results of conditions entirely outside of the farmer's control, and occur without regard to market needs.

Let us consider, for example, a drought. Certainly the farmer is not to blame when a drought occurs.

I am particularly delighted to see present the leader of the minority [Mr. WHERRY] who comes from the great farming State of Nebraska. I hope he will listen carefully so that he may finally come to understand what the Brannan plan really is. I may say that he is not alone in not thoroughly understanding it. As I said in the beginning of my speech, very few people in the entire country know what it really is. I repeat: If any Senator or any Representative wishes to ask me any questions about the Brannan plan I should be glad to have them write me. The writer will receive an answer containing a thorough explanation of his question.

I now read the fourth question I have been asked by the people:

Question No. 4. How long has our Government carried on a program of providing special protection for agriculture?

If one reads newspapers he finds that much is written in them about free enterprise. Some call the Brannan plan socialism. They say that if the Brannan plan is enacted it will mean the end of free enterprise, that it will result in regimentation. What is the real fact, Mr. President? It is to be found in my answer.

Answer. Our Government's interest and concern for agriculture dates back far in our history. A Federal Department of Agriculture was founded in 1862, but it was actually the result of almost a hundred years of preliminary steps. Growth of industrialization put agriculture on the defensive and business enterprise on the ascendency after the Civil War, resulting in frequent farm revolts for legislative protection starting with railroad reform and regulation.

Mr. President, I remember the time when there did not exist even a railroad commission in the various States, when there did not exist even a tax commission in the various States, and it took old fighting Bob La Follette, of Wisconsin, to get them for us. When Bob La Follette ran for President and said that the railroads should be evaluated so that the people would not have to pay more than a fair rate on the railroads as passengers, or for freight, do Senators know what he was called by the New York newspapers? He was called an anarchist, Mr. President. If anyone has any doubt about that, let them read the newspaper reports on the speeches he delivered at that time. They did not say he was a socialist; they did not say he was an IWW; they said he was an anarchist, trying to overthrow the Government of the United States.

I further answered by saying:

The agrarian reform movement spread around the turn of the century, but it was the collapse of agricultural prices in 1920 that proved to be a turning point that compelled a reorientation of our entire farm economy. Growing demand and pressure on lawmakers for equality for agriculture, continuing through the years, has been primarily responsible for the sweep of farm legislation from the early 1920's to the present day. Recognition of agriculture's right to Government intervention in its behalf, in the Nation's interest, came from the Businessmen's Commission on Agriculture of the United States Chamber of Commerce in 1927.

That statement came from businessmen, Mr. President, just as I say that today businessmen should be more interested in the Brannan plan than the farmer himself should be, because the Brannan plan may mean the businessman's very survival. The very chambers of commerce should be studying the Brannan plan and should be petitioning the Congress to pass it, instead of calling it socialism, regimentation, an enemy of free enterprise, and all the other names that businessmen are calling that plan.

Mr. President, what did the Businessmen's Commission on Agriculture, of the United States Chamber of Commerce, say in 1927? It declared:

Agriculture was left largely to the mercy of laissez faire, while governmental support went to the building up of commercial and industrial enterprises. The pursuit of agriculture, however, has at no time enjoyed protection such as was extended from the very beginning to commerce and industry through national legislation.

Mind you, Mr. President, that is the statement of businessmen. I am sorry there are not more businessmen now on the floor of the Senate. Of course, there is not a single laboring man in this body, not a single Senator who carries a union card, so far as I know. Yet the laboring men are doing all the work, of course. We hear men shout what a bad man John Lewis is and what a bad man Bill Green is and what a bad man Phil Murray is. There are in this entire body only four or five farmers. In this entire body there is not one laboring man, and only four or five farmers. As I recall, approximately two-thirds of the Members of the Senate are lawyers. When Senators speak in favor of agriculture and the farmer, sometimes it seems to me—I say this most respectfully—as though we were in the hopeless minority.

I repeat some of the statement by the Businessmen's Commission on Agriculture, of the United States Chamber of Commerce, in 1927:

The pursuit of agriculture, however, has at no time enjoyed protection such as was extended from the very beginning to commerce and industry through national legislation.

Mr. President, in the old days the Senate took care of industry. Senators and Representatives in the old days took care of the business interests. But, as the Businessmen's Commission on Agriculture, of the United States Chamber of Commerce, declared in 1927, agriculture was neglected.

I read further from their statement:

have we come to recognize the need of more equitable conditions, if agriculture is to sustain its position of relative importance in the entire economic system. It constitutes a challenge to modern statesmanship; and whatever else may be true, it is clear that the solution will not be had upon conventional lines.

Mr. President, the statement I am now reading is not the statement of WILLIAM LANGER, not the statement of a Communist or a Socialist or an anarchist or an IWW, but this is a statement by the Businessmen's Commission on Agriculture, of the United States Chamber of Commerce. I continue to read from their statement, issued in 1927:

We dare not forget what has been done for financial and industrial development. Why not for agricultural interests? The farmer's cause is the businessman's, from both the humanitarian and the economic point of view. We are forced to the conclusion that the accepted economic measures do not fit, at least do not cover the farmer's case; and that this situation presents a new challenge to economic and political advisers that cannot be evaded or met with slogans. Agriculture is affected with a clear and unquestionable public interest, and its status is a matter of national concern, calling for deliberate and far-sighted national policies, not only to conserve the natural and human resources involved in it, but to provide for the national security, promote a well-rounded prosperity, and secure social and political stability.

But, Mr. President, where were those gentlemen when a Republican President vetoed the McNary-Haugen bill—vetoed it twice, in fact. Where were they?

Talk with the leaders of any farm organization today, and they say the entire trouble of agriculture in the twenties stemmed from the fact that the McNary-Haugen bill was vetoed.

Mr. President, in my travels during the past year I was asked another question, as follows:

Question No. 5: It is my understanding that at the present time the Government carries on a price-support program to prevent disastrous declines in farm income. How does the price-support program work?

Mr. President, to my amazement, let me say, I found that very few of the taxpayers know how the price-support program works. And I may say, Mr. President, many citizens do not care how it works. They are far more interested in going to a night club, having a good time, rather than in sitting down and studying the price-support program and what it really is.

To the questions I have been asked about the program, I have replied as follows:

Answer. The present price-support program applies to a limited number of commodities, with prices supported to a flexible percentage of a parity tied to a fixed period in the past. The prices are supported through Government purchases and loans, withholding sufficient quantities from the market to force market prices up to the desired levels. Such methods work fairly well for storable commodities, but are not satisfactory for the perishable commodities making up three-fourths of our farm income.

In other words, the price-support program applies to only one-fourth of the farmers' products. The price-support program does not apply at all to three-fourths of the farmers' products. But how many persons know that?

I further answered as follows:

The fact that present legislation is inadequate to accomplish the objective of maintaining fair farm-purchasing power is reflected in the present trends of farm prices and farm income. Farm prices have dropped an average of 23 percent in less than 2 years and are still going down.

In my State farm prices have dropped nearly 34 percent, Mr. President.

I repeat that in the first 9 months of this year the farmers of North Dakota got $131,930,000 less than they got in the first 9 months of last year; and conditions are no different in Nebraska, Tennessee, or any other farm State.

We hear politicians and orators shout that the Brannan plan is no good, that it is socialism, that it is regimentation. But, Mr. President, they offer nothing in its place. They criticize, criticize, criticize; but nothing constructive comes from their lips.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LANGER. No; I refuse to yield. The distinguished Senator will have ample time upon this floor to explain his opposition to the Brannan plan when the time comes.

Mr. President, I might add that the Republican Party was in power in the Congress for from 1947 to 1949—2 years. They passed their agricultural bill on the last day of the session. The Senator from Vermont [Mr. AIKEN] said they did not have time, and he was not satisfied with it, and put it off 2 years. That is the treatment the farmer got. Then Republicans wonder why Iowa and some of the other States went Democratic. The Republican Party might as well realize today, Mr. President, that one of the main issues in 1950 is going to be the Brannan plan, whether they like it or do not like it. That is going to be an issue in the farm States. Any Republican who is interested merely has to take a trip among the farmers—I care not whether he goes among the farmers of Nebraska or of South Dakota, or of North Dakota, or of Montana, or of Wisconsin—and he will find that what I have said is correct. That is the issue.

I repeat, Mr. President, that in reply to the fifth question I was asked during my recent trip, I said that—

The fact that present legislation is inadequate to accomplish the objective of maintaining fair farm-purchasing power is reflected in the present trends of farm prices and farm income. Farm prices have dropped an average of 23 percent in less than 2 years and are still going down. But farmers still have to pay within 4 percent as much for what they buy as they paid 2 years ago. In 1947 farm operators had a net income of nearly $18,000,000,000. Last year it was down to around fourteen billion. The forecast for 1950 is for a net income of under $12,000,000,000.

A drop of one-third, Mr. President.

I merely venture to suggest that perhaps some of the Senators who are today absent may wish they had been present, when the votes are counted in 1950. Do they think the farmers are going to accept a cut of one-third, that they will accept a reduction of their income from $18,000,000,000 in 1947, to an income of less than $12,000,000,000, a drop of $6,000,000,000, in 1950, and not rebel? Do they think the farmers will not get rid of Senators and Representatives responsible for this drastic reduction? If Senators and Representatives think that way about it, then in my judgment they underestimate the intelligence of the producers in the United States. I continue the answer:

That is a decline of one-third in net farm income at a time when national income is at or near its all-time peak. Even in 1948, before the present declining trend got into full swing, the Bureau of Census estimated that 3,300,000, or about half of all the families in agriculture, received family cash incomes from both farm and nonfarm sources of less than $2,000, and that one-fourth received less than $1,000.

For whom do Senators think the farmers are going to vote under those circumstances? President Truman says, "We want the Brannan plan." The Republicans say, "Oh, no"—and they are joined by many Senators on the other side of the aisle—"you cannot have it. It is socialism. It is against free enterprise. It is regimentation." With one-fourth of all the farm families receiving less than $1,000 a year, how do you think they will vote, Mr. President?

I continue the answer:

Even at the peak of agricultural income, total per capita income of persons on farms was only about 60 percent as high as for persons not on farms. In 1949 this income gap was widened, and in 1950 it is expected to become still more disproportionate.

The farmer will be worse off.

The people on farms make up 20 percent of the Nation's population, yet they get less than 10 percent of the national income.

Are there those who think, in these days of the radio, when some of us fight for the farmers, and when we fight to get on the radio, that we will not let the farmers know about the situation? If any politician in America thinks that is going to happen, he will have another think coming.

Another question asked me as I went throughout the country was this:

Question No. 6: Many opponents of the Brannan plan say that it will give to the farmer an actual cash subsidy or dole, instead of price support for his products, and will make the farmer a public beggar for a fair income. What is your comment?

Answer. Certainly no one should imply that assurance of a fair return for the farmer's product is a dole, and the farmer certainly cannot be called a public beggar in accepting such assurance.

The Brannan plan rewards individual initiative, rewards efficiency in producing high-quality products and in sound marketing; it does not reward the inefficient or those too lazy to produce.

We know of the criticism of the Brannan plan. They will pay you for not raising pigs. They will pay you for not raising crops. I say not a word of it is true. I continue the answer:

We have a minimum-wage law because we believe it is sound national policy, but it certainly isn't a dole; the man who refuses to work or is inefficient in his work is replaced with someone else.

The least we can do is provide the same kind of protection to agriculture—to see that the efficient producer gets fair returns for his toil, even if it means Government aid when conditions beyond the farmer's control prevent such fair returns in the normal market.

We don't regard tariffs as "dole" for industry; we don't consider those using the mails "beggars" because the Government assumes a share of the costs.

Look at Time, Fortune, Newsweek, Life magazine, which cost the taxpayer $9,000,000 a year by way of postage to send through the mail. The magazines and newspapers do not come within $9,000,000 of paying their postage. The taxpayers pay it. We do not call it a dole, do we? But if the farmer is given a small amount, it is a dole, it is a subsidy. We say to the airplane companies who fly their planes all over the country and who carry the mail, "We will give you $45,000,000 a year. We will give it to you as a subsidy." And the air lines get it. When the farmer gets a little something, it is a dole, and he is a beggar. I continue reading my answer:

I think it is unfair to use such terms in regard to aid to agriculture that has been justified by historic tradition and economic necessity.

I now come to question No. 7. It is what the average man says who has not studied the Brannan plan. I read:

Question No. 7: Congressman MONRONEY of Oklahoma says, "This program, the more I study it and look at it and see it, makes me think of OPA—production payments, subsidies, low consumers' prices, high producers' prices, billions from the Treasury. It seems to me we are inadvertently drifting back to the old days of the OPA again." Do you see any similarity to OPA?

Answer. No; not at all. The OPA was aimed at preventing inflation, and put a ceiling on prices. The Brannan plan seeks to maintain the purchasing power of farmers, but leaves a free market for the dealer and consumer. It takes the Government out of the food-brokerage business in perishable farm products. The OPA curbed the normal trends of supply and demand, but the Brannan plan would allow prices to find their natural supply and demand level.

Then, as I went through the country, I was asked another question:

Question No. 8: The philosophy of the Brannan plan seems to be a high income for the farmer and cheap prices to the consumer. That sounds, of course, like magic. Many critics of the proposal say that somebody is going to have to pay the bill. Is there a danger that the cost of the program will be ruinous?

How often have we heard these words upon the Senate floor? Here is the answer:

Answer. There is a difference between cheap prices and normal prices, which is all the Brannan plan proposes. Of course, somebody is going to have to pay the bill for any Government aid to agriculture—they have to pay it right now. But the real cost of any Government farm program is the total food bill plus the Government expense. And the Brannan plan's proposal to allow consumers to share in the abundance of perishable products would not only avoid artificially maintained high food prices, but would save the Government the tremendous present cost in transporting, handling, processing, and storage of perishable products. The cost in the tax bill would be offset to a great extent by savings in the food bill, instead of the consumer being penalized by paying double as at present—both in taxes and higher food costs.

Mr. President, the present prices are so high in some instances that recently it was stated upon the floor of the Senate that one-third of the population is still undernourished.

On this question of cost, we must also consider the bigger question of avoiding a farm-led depression which would be far more costly than any farm aid now.

Instead of ruinous costs, as the question implies, the administration program could in effect be self-supporting by helping maintain the general economy at a full-employment level, increasing the national income and thereby increasing Government revenue without more taxes.

As I went around the country, Mr. President, I was asked question No. 9, which is as follows:

Question No. 9: Senator AIKEN has characterized the Brannan plan as an attempt to subsidize the food bill of all the American people and charge the cost up to a farm-support program. Do you think the Brannan plan will make the farmer appear to be the recipient of benefits which are really derived by other people?

Here is my answer to that question, Mr. President:

Perhaps the best answer to that is to quote Senator AIKEN. As you know, he is a good friend of the American farmer, although there are some points of difference between him and certain other friends of the farmer.

Mr. President, I doubt that there is a better friend of the American farmer sitting upon the Senate floor—I mean, when the Senators are all present. [Laughter.]

I repeat:

As you know, he is a good friend of the American farmer, although there are some points of difference between him and certain other friends of the farmer.

Senator AIKEN said in Senate committee hearings where Secretary Brannan's recommendations were being discussed that there were not irreconcilable differences. He went on to say, and this I am quoting: "As far as I am concerned, we can make a few minor amendments to title II of the Agricultural Act of 1948 and let it go into effect on January 1 and say that three-quarters of the Brannan plan is now in operation." That ends the quotation.

Again, let me say that there might be differences of opinion about the accuracy of that statement, but it indicates how Senator AIKEN was thinking.

The question is whether the people of this country would really charge the production payment part of the Brannan plan against the farmer as they now charge against the farmer the outlay for loans and Government purchases. Personally, I think the town and city people of this country will see that the payments are the sensible means of supporting perishables because they protect farm returns and let consumers buy at regular market prices. Our friends in organized labor have indicated this makes good sense to them. Many of them have always supported farm price-support legislation because they thought it served the general welfare even though it sometimes seemed to be hard on low-income workers.

Now the farmer has a chance to make even closer friends of the American laboring men and women, because this proposal by Secretary Brannan makes good sense to labor as well as to agriculture.

But before anybody gets any funny ideas about that, let me say that the Brannan plan does not propose to subsidize consumers. It is a farm program. It is a sensible way of supporting farm returns without holding up consumer prices.

Again I say, Mr. President, I hope that in the weeks and months to come anyone opposing the Brannan plan will write me regarding it. That goes for Senators and for everyone in the United States, because there will be one Senator upon this floor who will actively support the Brannan plan, and he will not be giving it merely lip service.

Mr. President, here is another question which was asked me at the time I was traveling through the farming area. It is question No. 10:

Question No. 10: The American Farm Bureau Federation takes the position that if the Brannan plan becomes law, the farmer's only hope for a fair income will depend on Government hand-outs from annual appropriations by Congress, and that the cost will be staggering. Is that a fair charge?

My answer is as follows:

Answer. That question is, in football language, a triple threat. At least it has three parts. Let us take the last one first. Is this a fair charge? My answer is "No, it is not a fair charge." Why do people say the cost will be staggering? Price supports do not go into effect, under the Brannan plan or any other plan, until the prices of farm commodities go down out of line with the prices that farmers pay for the things they have to buy.

It is only when the price of grain goes down and the price of farm machinery goes up that the Brannan plan would apply.

I continue reading:

In other words, price supports do not go into effect until farm commodity prices become unfairly low. The cost of price support cannot be staggering before farmers are in a depression, which is just one step from national depression. Those who say that the cost will be staggering are really saying that we are going to have a depression and had just as well make up our minds to it.

They are not optimists, Mr. President; on the contrary, they are pessimists. They say, "There is bound to be a depression." We have been hearing that for at least 18 months. Even some of the persons who send out little pamphlets for which they charge from $15 to $18 a year have been prophesying a depression.

In the Brannan plan, the administration is seeking to swing the full force of the Nation's effort into the fight against the start of depression. That is far different from waiting for a depression to develop before starting to fight. The people who want very low, or so-called stop-loss price supports, are really saying, "Let's wait until depression gets here before we do anything."

I might say, Mr. President, that some of my Republican colleagues, aided by a few Senators on the other side of the aisle, think in that way.

Let me point out something else about this business of "staggering cost." A lot depends on whose viewpoint you use to look at the problem. I think farm organizations should be expected to use the farmer's viewpoint. And from the farmer's viewpoint the cost is staggering whenever prices become unfair. Compared with 1947, farmers lost $2,000,000,000 of purchasing power in 1948 and another $2,000,000,000 of purchasing power in 1949. They are likely to lose another $2,000,000,000 of purchasing power in 1950. That is what I call a staggering cost. In this case the farmers are bearing the cost. Although they make up nearly 20 percent of the national population, they have been getting less than 10 percent of the national income, and last year they got less than 8 percent of the national income. Farm people can't afford the staggering cost of unfair prices, and I'm tired of hearing about the staggering cost of a decent level of prices.

As I said a few moments ago, last summer certain Republicans went on the radio and condemned the Brannan plan as being socialistic, regimentation, and all that sort of thing, but they offered no other plan in place of it. They were speaking at a time when prices of farm products were going down. The price of barley dropped from nearly $1.98 a bushel to approximately 76 cents a bushel. That did not bother some of those politicians. They are still against the Brannan plan, Mr. President.

I read further:

Now let's get back to that first part of the three-part question—whether farmers can depend upon Congress to provide decent price supports. I say that Congress has a good record on doing what it promises to do. If Congress enacts the Brannan plan, it will make good on this compact with the people. Let me point out also that the Brannan plan includes exactly the same kind of price-support program we now have for the storable crops. It includes loans and purchase agreements for cotton, corn, wheat, and tobacco just as we have now. How can anybody say that a program continuing what we have now would make farmers dependent on Congress for annual appropriations? They base their unfair charge upon the fact that the Brannan plan proposes to extend mandatory price support to some commodities that can't be adequately supported with our present legal machinery.

Mr. President, as I said a moment ago, at the present time loans are included on cotton, corn, wheat, and tobacco. What does the Brannan plan include in addition?

These commodities include some of the most important ones from the standpoint of farm income—milk—

Why should not the consumers, the women and the children, get milk cheaply?—

hogs, beef cattle, lambs, eggs, and chickens. True enough, the Brannan plan proposes to support these perishables by means of production payments, because that seems to be the only means of supporting them without taking them away from the consumers who want more of these nutritious foods.

The people in the cities want milk, they want eggs, chickens, lambs, and beef. Why should they not get them at fair prices?

It is also true that payments will require congressional appropriations. But the consumers will be able to see direct benefits to themselves from this type of price support. City Congressmen will gladly vote for this type of price support because it makes such good sense. Farmers will have new allies in their efforts to maintain a decent farm income.

Some people try to tell you that tax money for payments would be a subsidy while tax money for commodity loans and Government purchases of farm commodities does not amount to a subsidy. But that is drawing such a fine line that you can't see the line.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. GEORGE in the chair). Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. LANGER. I decline to yield at this time, very much to my regret.

Mr. MCCARTHY. That is all right.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator declines to yield.

Mr. LANGER. Did the Senator desire that I yield for an insertion in the RECORD?

Mr. MCCARTHY. I have some information I wish to give the Senate; but I shall wait.

Mr. LANGER. I ask unanimous consent that I may yield to the Senator without losing the floor, on the condition that what the Senator says will come after my address about the Brannan plan.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. LANGER. I always like to yield to the distinguished Senator from Wisconsin, he is so very courteous, and always yields to any Senator who asks him to.

(Mr. McCARTHY thereupon made a statement, which appears at the end of Mr. LANGER's remarks.)

Mr. LANGER. Mr. President, I now take up question No. 11 relative to the Brannan plan:

Question No. 11: Is there a possibility that the Brannan proposal would place a ceiling on opportunity in agriculture, which would result in penalizing efficiency so that food prices would go up and up?

My answer to that question is as follows:

Answer. The people who make that charge are always afraid to spell it out when they talk to a general audience. It comes from the fact that Secretary Brannan said there ought to be a limit on the amount of price support extended to any one farm. He suggested a very high limit that would cover the biggest family-sized farming operation in the country. He just pointed out that it has long been the policy of the Congress and the people of this country to encourage family-sized farming operations. Yet if we use tax dollars to support the biggest, most industrialized farming operations in the country, we will be encouraging them more than we encourage family farming. It just does not make sense.

Let me say that, for example, under the AAA program some farmers received as much as $25,000, when as a matter of fact some of us sought to place a limit of $1,000 to take care of the family size and type of farm. We did not succeed in having such action taken. The Tom Campbell farm in Montana received literally thousands upon thousands of dollars in soil-conservation payments. I repeat, that does not make sense. That is why Mr. Brannan's plan is preferable.

I continue to read my answer to question No. 11:

Maybe it puts a ceiling on opportunity to say that the Government is not going to use your tax dollars to encourage big-scale industrialized farming, but I do not see it that way. That is an argument that appeals to those who might like to get a Government check for half a million or a million dollars, but it does not have any appeal to the farmer who is struggling to put the children through school and pay off a $5,000 mortgage.

I come now to the twelfth question, as follows:

Question No. 12: As I understand the Brannan plan, the Government would pay to the farmer the difference between the price for which he sold his produce and the price the Government thinks he ought to get. Would the task of obtaining proof of bona fide sales by farmers not become an administrative and policing job of tremendous, bureaucratic proportions?

My answer is as follows:

Answer. That is a two-headed question, and both heads are wrong. First, the Government would not pay any farmer the difference between the support price and his actual selling price. Many people have got that idea and it's wrong. The production payment would cover the difference between the support price and an average market price. Look at what that means. Basing the payment on the average market price, the Government does not have to ask any farmer how much he got. There is no point in knowing. All the Government has to know is the quantity the farmer sold. The payment would be number of pounds times the payment per pound. The payment per pound would be the difference between the support price, as defined by law, and the average market price.

The individual farmer would have just as much advantage as ever in selling a premium product. He would have just as much advantage as ever in getting a better price in the market place. Suppose you sold a 200-pound hog for $13 a hundred. That is $26. Then suppose you got a payment of a dollar a hundred or $2. That would make a total of $28 that you received for the hog. But suppose your neighbor sold his hog for $13.50 a hundred or $27 plus the payment of $2 for a total of $29. The two of you would have exactly the same payment but your neighbor would have a dollar more for his hog, just as he would have had if there had been no payment. If that happened, I think you would feel you had not done a very good job of marketing and would try next time to get that extra dollar out of the market.

If the Government tried to support your hog price by buying pork from the packer, you do not know whether you would get the support price or not. With the payment, you would know for certain.

I remember an actual situation which existed 3 or 4 years ago. The farmers were unable to sell in the nearest towns the hogs they butchered. The packers received the bulk of the profit. Farmers sold hogs for as low as $3 apiece.

I continue to read my answer to question No. 12:

Take another illustration. Suppose you take a loan on your wheat or corn. Somebody has to make sure how much wheat you put in the bin as collateral for the loan. That is only a fair business procedure. Well, it would be exactly the same kind of information in the case of a payment—merely, the amount you sold.

What is so complicated about that? Why should anybody say that would be a tremendous administrative and policing job? The same farmer-committeemen who handle the loan program—your own neighbors—would handle the payment program. In fact, Secretary Brannan says it would take fewer officeholders to handle payments than it does the present Government purchases. When the Government goes into the market and buys stuff, it has to have experts who know what they are buying; it has to have men who know the processing businesses, and transportation and storage experts. It has to pay the high costs of buying, storing, and transporting what it buys and then has to either sell the stuff to some foreign country at a cut rate or give the stuff away or let it rot. Talk about bureaucratic red tape and expense. Huh.

Just as was said by my distinguished friend the Senator from Wisconsin respecting eggs a little while ago. Talk about bureaucratic red tape and expense.

Finally, I was asked this question:

Question No. 13: Where, in your opinion, does the best interest of the American public lie in this whole business of protecting the farmer?

My answer is as follows:

Answer. I think I have already answered that question. But I will say it again. First, we cannot afford to let the farmer subsidize the rest of the American people out of his own pocket. He cannot do it very long. He goes broke, and then all the rest of us start going broke. That is not fair anyway, and democracy cannot afford that kind of unfairness.

So we have got to have a reasonable price-support program.

Second, I think a reasonable price-support program is one that will keep farm prices and income from sliding very far at any one time, regardless of where they start from. Any big drop is going to hurt a lot of people. So we have got to have supports based on some recent period.

Third, we might as well learn that you cannot build bricks with straw alone. If our objective is a decent farm income, we have got to support more than just a few storable commodities. We have got to support commodities that are most important to farm income, even if they happen to be perishable.

Fourth, we have to find some means of supporting perishables that will not just take food away from consumers and make everybody mad. Let us be sensible about that.

Fifth, we might as well realize that neither farmers nor anybody else can prosper unless we keep our economy growing. If the time comes when we have got to fight the wolf of depression on our own doorstep, O. K., we will do it. But first let us at least try to keep him off in the hills. Let us put our effort on building a bigger and a stronger economy—not in worrying about what we would need to do if depression came. The best interests of the American public lie in maintaining a strong and healthy agriculture—not just at some future time but now.

Mr. President, I understand that my distinguished friend the junior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. McCARTHY] desires to address himself to the Brannan plan, and I shall be very glad to yield to him for that purpose.

Mr. McCARTHY. Mr. President, I should like to say, first, that I very heartily disagree with the Senator that the enactment of the Brannan plan will be of any benefit either to the farmer or the consumer. I think it would be economically unsound to undertake to subsidize 140,000,000 people. As one Senator said the other day, we can simply and easily explain the Brannan plan in this fashion: It would mean that the housewife would go to the grocery store and would pay one-half or three-quarters of the cost of the food. On the face of things, it would seem that the housewife would then be getting a bargain. But thereafter her husband would have to pay the tax collector not only the balance of the cost of the food but also the cost of collection.

I agree with the Senator that there is something basically wrong with a farm program which piles up millions and millions of dollars' worth of eggs in the limestone caves of Kentucky, where they will spoil, and which also accumulates millions of bushels of potatoes, which also will spoil.

I think many other Senators must have had the same experience I had recently when I received a letter from one of my constituents, in which she said:

I have six children. My brother-in-law lives outside the town. He is raising hogs. He can buy grade A potatoes at 25 cents a bushel to feed to his hogs. But when I go to the grocery store I have to pay 85 cents a peck for No. 2 potatoes. My question is, Are his hogs more important to the Nation than my children are?

Mr. President, it is rather difficult to answer that question under the present system of building up surpluses.

So I agree with the Senator that any farm program which continues to build up surpluses is bad. I disagree when the Senator says the present difficulties would be cured by the Brannan plan.

I should like to ask the Senator this question: Instead of undertaking to subsidize 140,000,000 people, many of whom do not need food subsidies, but can afford to pay a reasonable price for the food they require, such a price as will give the farmer a fair profit, why would it not be much more sensible to inaugurate some type of food-stamp plan, so that when there was a surplus of eggs, butter, potatoes, or any of the other farm products there would simply be issued enough food stamps to those in the lower income groups so that surplus products would be eaten, instead of piled up and allowed to go to waste?

I may say that suggestion is somewhat along the lines of the plan which is the basis of the bill of the Senator from Vermont [Mr. AIKEN], who is now on the floor, except I think his bill goes too far in covering not only products in surplus, but all food products.

But I believe it can be applied to food products which are in surplus supply. Then, instead of having those products piled up and allowed to spoil, they would be made available to families who otherwise could not purchase sufficient food.

Mr. AIKEN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LANGER. Mr. President, the distinguished Senator from Vermont [Mr. AIKEN] was Governor of Vermont at the time when I was Governor of North Dakota. We had the food-stamp plan in operation at that time, as the Senator knows. So I am delighted to yield to him.

Mr. AIKEN. Mr. President, I think it is generally agreed that the food-stamp plan worked better than any of the other plans which were tried in the places where it was tried during the depression days of the thirties.

This bill, which I have introduced every session in the Senate, was originally introduced by the predecessor of the Senator from Wisconsin, former Senator La Follette, and myself. The bill provides for making available enough of the right kinds of foods to persons of low income to permit them to enjoy a reasonably adequate diet. It was not intended, however, solely as a surplus-food-disposal plan, but the primary purpose was to make sure that the people of the Nation have sufficient to eat to keep them healthy.

There are probably approximately 50,000,000 people, or about one-third of the population of the country, who today do not have sufficient income to enable them to buy enough of the right kinds of food to keep them in proper health. If those constituting that one-third of our people were able to purchase enough such foods, they would increase their consumption of the resistance-building foods—such as citrus-fruit juices, lettuce, and tomatoes—by approximately 60 percent. They would increase their consumption of milk, dairy products, poultry products, and meats approximately from 30 to 33 percent. They would increase their consumption of other fruits and vegetables approximately 20 percent. They would not increase their consumption of cereals as such. However, if they were able to purchase meats, poultry products, and milk, instead of cereals—of course they have to purchase cereals when their income is too low—that would mean that instead of consuming 1 bushel of wheat, corn, rye, or whatever might be the cereal they otherwise would eat, they would be consuming from 4 to 7 bushels of grain in the form of animal products, and thereby would provide an outlet for probably all the surplus grains we would have.

Indirectly, that would provide an outlet for all the farm surpluses we have today, and more besides. However, that was not the primary purpose of the bill. Its primary purpose was to make sure that everyone would have enough of the right kind of food to eat.

Much to the surprise of some persons, those who are not able to buy sufficient to eat are not loafers. To the contrary, they are old people, people living on pensions, people living on very low incomes, widows and families of servicemen, and persons of similar types. The estimate of from 40,000,000 to 50,000,000 was made several years ago by some of the experts of the Department of Agriculture; but I daresay that if the persons in that category had enough food made available to them through the normal channels of trade, we would not have a surplus of food in the United States.

Mr. McCARTHY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LANGER. I yield, to permit the Senator from Wisconsin to ask a question of the Senator from Vermont.

Mr. McCARTHY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Senator from North Dakota may not lose the floor by doing so, so that I may ask a question of the Senator from Vermont.

Mr. LANGER. I yield for that purpose.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HOLLAND in the chair). Unanimous consent is requested for that purpose. Without objection, consent is granted.

Mr. McCARTHY. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Vermont a question. I believe he will agree with me that there is very slight possibility that his bill, in its present form, will pass the present Senate or the present House of Representatives; and I believe the Senator also will agree with me that if his bill, insofar as it would apply to surpluses, were passed, it would very well dispose of our surplus-food problem. Here is what I have in mind: At the present time we are supporting the price of butter. The Government is buying tremendous quantities of butter. We are building up a huge stock pile of butter; and with the Lever Bros. oleomargarine bill having been passed by the Senate, if more people eat oleomargarine, as the oleomargarine companies think they will, it will mean that the Government will have to buy even more butter, and the problem will become even more acute than it is at the present time. The same situation will apply to eggs and other farm products. Unless something is done vast quantities of foodstuffs will spoil; there can be no question about that.

I wonder whether the Senator will agree with me that it would be an excellent thing to support his bill, insofar as it would apply to surplus farm products. I do not think anyone will attack the reasoning behind that suggestion. No one will say that instead of permitting eggs to spoil in the limestone caves of Kentucky, and ultimately having them dumped into the ocean, it would not be better to use them in the way suggested in the Senator's bill.

If we would make such food available to the low-income families, at least it would solve the tremendous problem of surpluses. Does the Senator agree with me as to that?

Mr. AIKEN. Mr. President, let me say that I regard the bill itself as more in the nature of an authorization to do these things. The extent to which it would be applied would be the extent to which Congress provided the details and the means.

As the bill is written, my recollection is that it provides that up to 10 percent of the coupons provided to the low-income families would have to be used in purchasing foods which happened to be in surplus at the time.

There is no reason why the Congress could not cut the cloth to fit the pattern, or whatever the expression may be; and it would be much better to have spoilable surpluses used by low-income persons who cannot afford to buy such food, than it would be to let the food spoil. I agree with the Senator from Wisconsin to that extent.

I think our ultimate objective should be an adequate and proper diet for all our people. Each step we take in that direction would be for the good of the country as a whole.

During the delivery of Mr. LANGER's speech:

Mr. McCARTHY. Mr. President, my only reason for asking the Senator from North Dakota to yield at this time is to correct what I think is an erroneous impression, upon the part of a great number of farmers, especially, to the effect that the Brannan plan would afford them higher support prices than they receive under the Anderson plan.

I have before me a document issued by the Department of Agriculture. We can assume certainly that it is not unfriendly toward the Brannan plan, in view of the fact that the Secretary is Mr. Brannan. The document lists in detail the support prices under the Brannan plan and under the Anderson plan, which the Congress adopted. The Anderson plan, of course, takes its name from the former Secretary of Agriculture, now the junior Senator from New Mexico [Mr. ANDERSON].

I should like to read these figures into the RECORD. This table gives the support prices for selected commodities under various alternative plans.

Wheat, under the Anderson plan, $1,90; under the Brannan plan, $1.84.

Corn, under the Anderson plan, $1.49 a bushel; under the Brannan plan, $1.44 a bushel.

Butterfat, under the Anderson plan, 71.6 cents a pound; under the Brannan plan, 65.8 cents a pound.

I might say that the following item is of great interest to the Senator from Wisconsin, and I am sure to the Senator of North Dakota, because of the amount of milk products our States produce:

Milk, under the Anderson plan, $4.48 a hundredweight; under the Brannan plan, $4.16 a hundredweight.

Hogs, under the Anderson plan, $19.20 a hundredweight; under the Brannan plan, $18.60 a hundredweight.

Eggs, under the Anderson plan, 46.5 cents a dozen; under the Brannan plan, 45 cents a dozen.

Chickens, under the Anderson plan, 29.5 cents a pound; under the Brannan plan, 28.5 cents a pound.

Flaxseed, under the Anderson plan, $4.37 a bushel; under the Brannan plan, $4.23 a bushel.

Potatoes, under the Anderson plan, $1.64 a bushel; under the Brannan plan, $1.57 a bushel.

Beef cattle, under the Anderson plan, $17.30 a hundredweight; under the Brannan plan, $16.60 a hundredweight.

Lambs, under the Anderson plan, $18.90 a hundredweight; under the Brannan plan, $18.10 a hundredweight.

Oats, under the Anderson plan, 83.8 cents a bushel; under the Brannan plan, 81.2 cents a bushel.

Barley, under the Anderson plan, $1.24 a bushel; under the Brannan plan, $1.20 a bushel.

Wool, under the Anderson plan, 5.07 cents a pound; under the Brannan plan, 4.91 cents a pound.

My reason for asking the Senator from North Dakota to yield was that I might introduce these figures into the RECORD at this time, because of the completely erroneous idea, many have, as to support-prices under the Anderson plan as now in effect, and the Brannan plan as proposed. A considerable number of the farmers of my State write me saying, "Why do you not support the Brannan plan? It will give us more money." I thought they should know that under the figures issued by the Department of Agriculture itself, the support-prices under the Brannan plan would be considerably lower than those under the Anderson plan.

I should like to say also that many people throughout this Nation, I believe, lose sight of the inherent, basic difference in the reasoning of those who support the Anderson plan and those who support the Brannan plan. The reasoning of those who supported the Anderson plan was that the farmer should get a reasonably fair price for his products, and that labor should receive a sufficiently high wage so that the laborers could pay that fair price, and that if we start subsidizing the farmer, we must in turn and in fairness also subsidize everyone else.

I thank the Senator from North Dakota very much for allowing me to introduce these figures. Let me repeat, for the benefit of my colleagues, that the figures I have offered were issued by the Department of Agriculture, showing support prices which the farmers would receive under the Brannan plan, and the support prices which they are now receiving under the Anderson plan. With no exception whatever the figures under the Anderson plan indicate a higher support price than those under the Brannan plan.

For the first time under any farm legislation which has been put into effect, dairy farmers are treated with some degree of equality, under the Anderson plan. The Anderson plan has for the first time recognized that the dairy industry is important, and that so long as we support the price of cattle feeds then in fairness we must also support the price of milk; otherwise the dairy farmer will be caught between the upper and the nether millstones. One of the reasons why I favored the Anderson plan above the Brannan plan is that it does give the dairy farmer a much fairer deal than he would receive under the Brannan plan. Obviously there were many other reasons.

I thank the Senator.

Mr. LANGER. I might say to the Senator that he is not including many other things, such as eggs, chickens, and some of the other products, as to which the Brannan plan is much better than the Anderson plan, taking the general average.

The schedule from which the Senator has been reading was put into the RECORD by my colleague the junior Senator from North Dakota [Mr. YOUNG], at an earlier time.

Mr. McCARTHY. While the Senator is scrutinizing the list I have been using, I wish to call a matter to his attention? He has mentioned eggs. Congress has given the Secretary of Agriculture the power to establish a support price for eggs which would be higher than under the Brannan plan. Secretary Brannan has not done that. Perhaps he may have some justification because of what we failed to do when we enacted the Anderson plan. The Senator will recall that the Senator from Washington [Mr. MAGNUSON] offered an amendment to the Anderson plan which provided that the President would have the power to cut off the importation of any farm products which were being price-supported and which were in surplus. The representatives of the State Department came to the Capitol and did a very good job of lobbying, and succeeded in defeating the amendment in conference. The end result is that as of today, if we establish a fair support price for eggs for the American farmer, we will promptly have a tremendous flood of eggs coming from China and from other foreign countries. We have dried and stored, in the caves in Kentucky, I do not know how many million dollars' worth of eggs. Those eggs will last about 16 or 17 months, and then they will be taken out and dumped into the ocean. So the end result is that it is extremely difficult for Secretary Brannan to establish a fair support price for eggs, because once he does that we will drain the eggs from every poverty-stricken area of the world, because the people there cannot afford to pay the support price of eggs, while our people can.

As of today the Secretary of Agriculture, Mr. Brannan, who, of course, advocates the Brannan plan, has the power to fix a support price for eggs and the other farm products the Senator mentioned, at a figure higher than those contained in the Brannan plan itself. He has failed to do so. As I said, there are some hazards brought about by the antifarmer lobbying of the State Department and the failure on the part of the Senate and the House to realize that if we do not give the President the power and the duty to say, "We will not allow this country to be flooded with farm products which are in surplus and which are price supported," we may wreck the farm program.

Mr. LANGER. Mr. President, the price has been fixed at 25 cents a dozen. That is not the only trouble, however. The trouble comes about because of powdered eggs. If the price of powdered eggs could go up to 96 cents a hundred pounds, instead of 93 cents, the entire matter might be adjusted satisfactorily. At Jamestown, N. Dak., some farmers are receiving only 20 cents a dozen. As the Senator from Wisconsin undoubtedly knows, the Secretary of Agriculture has been working on that matter for a couple of weeks. It is possible he may arrive at a satisfactory solution of the problem.

Mr. McCARTHY. I lived on a farm for a good many years. On that farm we raised a good many chickens and produced eggs. The Senator and I know that a farmer would go broke if he were obliged to produce eggs at a selling price of 25 cents a dozen.

Mr. LANGER. Certainly.

Mr. McCARTHY. Mr. President, what I may not have made clear is: First. The Secretary has the power to fix the support price of eggs at a figure higher than at which it could be fixed under the Brannan plan. Second. We are in grave danger of wrecking any farm-support program if we continue to accede to the State Department's demands. The Senator from Washington [Mr. MAGNUSON] submitted an amendment to the Anderson bill, because of the fact that he recognized this dangerous situation. His amendment would result in avoiding that danger.

Mr. LANGER. That is correct.

Mr. McCARTHY. That amendment contemplated this situation: In case of the existence of a support price for eggs, if there is already a surplus of eggs—and the same applies to potatoes, or whatever the product may be for which there is a support price—and if in turn we are destroying those food products, then we are not doing the American farmer, the American producer, or the foreign consumer any good by allowing a flood of foreign products into the United States, because this is what would happen. Let us consider eggs. If we support eggs at a figure which the laboring man can afford to pay, at a figure which will give the farmer a fair profit, then we know that the Chinese housewife cannot purchase Chinese eggs, because the Chinese producers will ship them into this country and sell them at our support price. That is what is happening today.

That is what the Senator from Washington [Mr. MAGNUSON], by his amendment, was trying to avoid. That amendment was agreed to by a substantial majority. It went to conference, and, as so often happens, the bright boys from the State Department came to the Capitol and put on a tremendous lobby and, unfortunately, they convinced—they did not convince me nor did they convince the Senator from North Dakota—a majority of both Houses, and a majority of the conferees that we should continue a practice which may well wreck the farm support program.

I realize that this may be getting slightly away from what the Senator had in mind, but in view of the fact that he mentioned the support price under the Brannan plan I wanted him to have it in mind, and to get the benefit of his comments thereon.

Mr. LANGER. What the Senator has said about eggs is, of course true, due to the entire tariff policy of the Democratic Party. That is why we in the West are opposed to that policy. If the Democratic Party had its way in carrying out that policy, it would result in bringing cattle into the United States from Canada, and in bringing into the United States wheat, oats and barley, all in competition with the farmers of Wisconsin, Minnesota and North and South Dakota. The matter of the peril point, on which the Republican Party is solidly united, is involved in that very question.

PROPOSED CHANGE IN METHOD OF ELECTION OF PRESIDENT AND VICE PRESIDENT

The Senate resumed the consideration of the resolution (S. J. Res. 2) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States providing for the election of President and Vice President.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the body of the RECORD at this point a compilation which has been prepared for me by the Library of Congress, which shows that in the past hundred years there were 12 Presidential elections in which the candidates who became President did not receive a majority of the popular vote. This tabulation lists the Presidents, the years, and the percentages. It is of interest to note that Lincoln, for example, received only 39 percent of the vote in 1860.

There being no objection, the tabulation was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

MINORITY PRESIDENTS

In the past 100 years (27 elections), the following were elected President even though they did not have a majority of the popular vote:

	Percent of popular vote
1844, Polk	49.6
1848, Taylor	47.4
1856, Buchanan	45.4
1860, Lincoln	39.9
1876, Hayes	47.9
1880, Garfield	48.3
1884, Cleveland	48.9
1888, Harrison	47.8
1892, Cleveland	46.0
1912, Wilson	41.8
1948, Truman	49.5

Mr. LANGER. Mr. President, yesterday the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] submitted his joint resolution proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, providing for a change in the method of election of President and Vice President. At that time I sent to the desk an amendment in the nature of a substitute. I ask unanimous consent that it be read by the clerk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the amendment will be stated.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. It is proposed to strike out all after the resolving clause and insert the following:

That the following article is proposed as an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, which shall be valid to all intents and purposes as part of the Constitution when ratified by conventions in three-fourths of the several States:

"ARTICLE—

"SECTION 1. The executive power shall be vested in a President of the United States of America. He shall hold his office during the term of 4 years, and, together with the Vice President chosen for the same term, be nominated and elected as hereinafter provided.

"SEC. 2. The official candidates of political parties for President and Vice President shall be nominated at a primary election by direct vote of the qualified voters who are members of the respective political parties in the several States. The time of such primary election shall be the same throughout the United States, and, unless the Congress shall by law appoint a different day, such primary election shall be held on the first Wednesday after the first Monday in June in the year preceding the expiration of the regular term of President and Vice President. Persons voting in primaries for candidates for President and Vice President in each State shall have the qualifications requisite for electors of the most numerous branch of the legislature of such State, and shall have been members of their respective political parties for not less than 6 months prior to the holding of such primaries.

"The names which shall appear in each of the States on the primary ballots for candidates of the respective political parties shall be only of those persons who shall have filed petitions at the seat of the Government of the United States with the Secretary of State. Such petitions shall be valid only if filed at least 60 days prior to the day of primary election and if signed by qualified voters in any or all of the several States, equal in number to at least one-tenth of 1 percent of the total number of popular votes cast throughout the United States for all candidates for President (or, in the case of the primary election first held after the ratification of this article, for electors of President and Vice President) in the most recent previous Presidential election.

"SEC. 3. Within 30 days after such primary election, the chief executive of each State shall make distinct lists of all persons of each political party, for whom votes were cast, and the number of votes for each such person, which lists shall be signed, certified, and transmitted under the seal of such State to the seat of the Government of the United States, directed to the Secretary of State, who shall open all certificates and count the votes. The person receiving the greatest aggregate number of popular votes of any party for candidate for President shall be the official candidate of such party, throughout the United States, for President; and the person receiving the greatest aggregate number of popular votes of any party for candidate for Vice President shall be the official candidate of such party, throughout the United States, for Vice President.

"SEC. 4. In the event of the death or resignation of the official candidate of any political party for President, the person nominated by such political party for Vice President shall be the official candidate of such party for President. In the event of the death or resignation of the official candidate of any political party for Vice President, a national committee of such party shall designate a candidate for Vice President, who shall then be deemed the official candidate for Vice President of such party, but in choosing such candidate the vote shall be taken by States, the delegation from each State having one vote. A quorum for such purpose shall consist of a delegate or delegates from two-thirds of the States, and a majority of all States shall be necessary to a choice.

"SEC. 5. The electoral-college system of electing the President and Vice President of the United States is hereby abolished. The President and Vice President shall be elected by the people of the several States as shall be determined by direct vote of the qualified voters at a general election. The time of such election in each State shall be the same throughout the United States, and unless the Congress shall by law appoint a different day, such election shall be held on the first Wednesday after the first Monday in November in the year preceding the expiration of the regular term of the President and Vice President. The voters in each State shall vote directly for President and Vice President and shall have the qualifications requisite for electors of the most numerous branch of the State legislature. The names of candidates officially nominated in primaries as herein provided, and in addition the names of any independent candidates, shall appear in every State upon the official ballot for the offices of President and Vice President, but names of any such independent candidates shall so appear only following the filing with the Secretary of State of the United States, at least 60 days prior to the day of the election, of petitions signed by qualified voters in any or all of the several States, equal in number to at least one-half of 1 percent of the total number of popular votes cast throughout the United States for all candidates for President.

"SEC. 6. Within 30 days after such election, the chief executive of each State shall make distinct lists of all persons receiving votes for President and all persons receiving votes for Vice President, and the number of votes cast in such State for each, which lists shall be signed, certified, and transmitted under the seal of such State to the seat of the Government of the United States directed to the President of the Senate. The Congress shall be in session on the 6th day of January, or if such day shall fall on Sunday on the 7th day of January, and on that day the President of the Senate shall, in the presence of the Senate and House of Representatives, open all the certificates and the votes shall then be counted. The person having the greatest aggregate number of popular votes for President shall be President, and the person having the greatest aggregate number of popular votes for Vice President shall be Vice President. No person constitutionally ineligible to the office of President shall be eligible to that of Vice President of the United States.

"SEC. 7. In the event that it is shown by such certificates that the two persons receiving the greatest number of votes for President have received an equal number of such votes, the House of Representatives shall choose immediately, by ballot, the President. In choosing the President the votes shall be taken by States, the representation from each State having one vote. A quorum for this purpose shall consist of a member or members from two-thirds of the States, and a majority of all the States shall be necessary to a choice. If the House of Representatives shall not choose a President whenever the right of choice shall devolve upon them, before the 20th day of January next following, then the Vice President shall act as President, as in the case of death or other constitutional disability of the President. In the event that it is shown by such certificates that the two persons receiving the greatest number of votes for Vice President have received an equal number of such votes, the Senate shall choose the Vice President. A quorum for this purpose shall consist of two-thirds of the whole number of Senators and a majority of the whole number shall be necessary to a choice.

"SEC. 8. The Congress shall have power to provide by appropriate legislation for methods of determining any dispute or controversy that may arise in the counting and canvassing of votes for President and Vice President in any such primary or general election. The places and manner of holding such primary or general election shall be prescribed in each State by the legislature thereof; but the Congress may at any time by law make or alter such regulations. The Congress and the several States shall have concurrent power to prevent fraud and corrupt practices in connection with such primary or general elections.

"SEC. 9. This article shall be inoperative unless it shall have been ratified as an amendment to the Constitution by conventions in the several States as provided in the Constitution."

Mr. LANGER. Mr. President, very briefly stated, the substitute provides for the abolition of the electoral college and for direct election of the President and Vice President of the United States by the direct vote of the people of the country. Yesterday, when the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts was speaking in behalf of his resolution, he very kindly yielded to me for a question. I asked the Senator this question:

Is it not true that if the election of a President were to be decided on the basis of the popular vote, there would be a much greater attendance at the polls than there would be if the measure sponsored by the Senator from Massachusetts should go into effect?

I may say the Senator had just been showing that for quite a number of years there had been in some of the States of the Union a very, very light vote for the candidates for various offices, and that the voting was, and is, at a very low ebb.

The junior Senator from Massachusetts replied to my question as follows:

Mr. LODGE. I think that is true. I think there would be a greater attendance, yes. As the Senator from North Dakota knows, I have been in favor of a direct popular vote, but, being a realist, I discovered some years ago that it was an impossibility to achieve, because it did away with the principle of equality of States in the Senate. But I think unquestionably a direct popular vote would increase interest very much.

Naturally, Mr. President, I appreciated the open and frank statement of the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts. As always, he was frank in his answer.

Mr. President, by direct vote of the people we elect the mayors of our cities; we elect the governors of our States; we elect Representatives in Congress and we elect United States Senators. No good reason has ever been shown to me why the people of the United States should not go to the polls and elect their President and Vice President by direct vote. Surely the heads of good, patriotic Americans must hang in shame when we think back to the Republican convention at Chicago at the time when General Leonard Wood and some other Republicans were running for the Presidency, and it was shown that some of the delegates were paid as much as $100,000 for their votes. Surely the heads of patriotic Americans ought to hang in shame when they consider the nomination of attorneys for the House of Morgan by the Democratic Party—Alton B. Parker and John W. Davis. I remember, as a youth, sitting on the front porch of my ranch home when the Republican Party waited in their convention and let a whole day go by because Andrew Mellon was busy and could not get there. They had to wait for him to tell them whom to nominate for President of the United States on the Republican ticket.

More recently, all of us remember when the Republican Party nominated Wendell Willkie, and the book which was written telling how that nomination was secured. I talked with some of the delegates and was informed that they were paid $25 apiece to sit in the gallery from morning until night and to chant "We want Willkie." They were headed by Tom Lamont of the House of Morgan, who went to Philadelphia to secure the nomination of Wendell Willkie, a great power magnate.

What did we see in Chicago when Mr. Roosevelt was nominated again? A man was stationed in the sewer with broadcasting equipment, and at the appropriate time he shouted, "We want Roosevelt." It was planned by a gang in Chicago when the Democratic Convention took place. I call them gangsters, for want of a better term. Some people call them politicians. Anyway, a similar gang nominated Wendell Willkie on the Republican ticket. A couple of weeks later, after meeting in a smoke-filled room, after they had made their deals, the other party nominated a man. There was not much choice. The big business interests nominated both of them, and the leaders of the big business interests went to a cocktail room and drank their gin and bourbon and said to the American people, "Go out and fight and see which of the two will be elected." They did not care, much, which of the two it would be.

That is the kind of thing, Mr. President, that my substitute amendment is designed to stop. Surely, when our forefathers came to this continent they intended to make this Government a government of, for, and by the people.

In my substitute I have gone further than to provide a direct primary in which any man or woman may be nominated for President. I have gone further, and have provided that even though that man or woman shall become the candidate of the party, anyone else who can get a certain percentage of signers to a petition may also run, if he so desires.

My distinguished friend from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] stated yesterday that in one State only 1½ percent of the people voted. Think of it, Mr. President, only 1½ percent of the people voted. One gang names one candidate, the other gang names another candidate, and then they call on the American people to campaign for their election. The people do not have a thing to say as to whom the candidate will be. Why should they be interested? What difference has it made in the past three or four elections, so far as policy was concerned, who would be President?

I do not agree with the bipartisan policy of the Democrats and Republicans, and as an American who does not believe in it I am entitled to be heard. Before this bipartisan policy began to operate 108,000 persons in Los Angeles went to hear Burton K. Wheeler. There are millions of persons in this country who do not agree with the bipartisan policy which we have had in the past 5 years. Billions of dollars have been given away, Mr. President. I certainly do not agree with it. I did not vote for it. Already some persons have started to apologize, and are saying, "I did not vote to give all that money to China. I did not know that the Communists were going to get nine-tenths of all that material." Let them go out among the voters who have to pay income taxes and explain why they voted to send billions upon billions of dollars to almost every foreign country on the face of the globe. The United States Government has given away a sum larger than the assessed valuation of 11 States of the Union. We have given away $3,750,000,000.

Some persons have had the temerity to say, "If you do not vote for it, we will have war." They said, "We are for peace."

I voted against it, Mr. President. I said the Democratic Party ought to throw away the donkey emblem and the Republican Party ought to throw away the elephant emblem, and both parties should agree on the same emblem, namely, the scoopshovel.

Surely, Mr. President, we are all familiar with the book written by Mary Sparks telling about the meeting arranged by Whitelaw Reid and Mrs. Reid in New York at which the British Ambassador, Lord Halifax, was present. Whom did they invite to that little, select group? The Senator from Ohio [Mr. TAFT] and Mrs. Taft. A waiter was standing behind each chair. One of the greatest things BOB TAFT ever did in his life occurred when they wanted to commit him to the British policy of plunging this Nation into war and giving away money to Great Britain. BOB TAFT walked out of that room. He was too big an American to stay there. Some people say that when he walked out he lost to Wendell Willkie the Republican nomination for the Presidency.

Mr. President, I introduced this substitute as an original bill 4 years ago, 3 years ago, and 2 years ago. The last time I introduced it, the Christian Science Monitor published an article entitled "Let the People Elect the President."

I ask unanimous consent that this article may be printed at this point in my remarks.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

LET THE PEOPLE ELECT THE PRESIDENT—VOTERS OF UNITED STATES URGED TO RISE UP AND DEMAND ABOLITION OF ELECTORAL COLLEGE

(By Hon. WILLIAM LANGER, United States Senator from North Dakota)

The Republican Party hopes next year to elect its first President in 16 years. But, even though its candidate polls a clear-cut majority of the total popular vote and wins the election in more than two-thirds of the States, he still may never become President.

Instead, his Democratic opponent could be declared the victor and sworn in for a 4-year term, and the Republicans would be helpless to do anything about it.

You may say that for that to happen would be a rank miscarriage of justice; a violation of the principles of democratic government. Very true. But it has happened before and can happen again. Twelve of our 32 Presidents have been elected to that high office without the benefit of a majority of the popular vote. All because we have neglected to make a very necessary change in the Constitution and to replace a worn-out part of the election machinery which it set up.

I think the people of the United States will make that change if given an opportunity to do so. To afford them that opportunity, I have introduced in the Senate a constitutional amendment to abolish the electoral college and provide for the election of the President and the Vice President by a direct popular vote of the people.

My resolution would make one other very important change; it would take the job of nominating the candidates for President and Vice President out of the hands of the politicians and place that solemn responsibility where it belongs—squarely on the shoulders of the American people. I think we ought to take the selection of our highest executive officers out of the atmosphere of smoke-filled back rooms and political horse-trading.

I want to make absolutely certain that the man sworn into the Presidency of the United States is the man that the majority of the people want.

We certainly have no guarantee of that now, under the electoral-college system. In most States, the people never have a chance to vote directly for either President or Vice President. They vote for electors who in turn are pledged, but not legally bound, to cast their ballots for the respective candidates of the Republican or Democratic Party?

Each State has the same number of electoral votes for President as it has Representatives in Congress. My State (North Dakota), for example, has four. Wyoming has 3, New York 47, Massachusetts 17.

Under the unit or bloc-voting system of the electoral college, each State is required to cast all its electoral votes for one candidate, the candidate having the highest popular vote. If the Republican candidate carries New York, he gets all 47 of the State's electoral votes, even though his margin over the Democratic candidate in the popular vote may be only a single ballot.

To see what a threat to democracy this electoral-college system is, and how easily the will of the people could be thwarted, let's take a look at what might conceivably happen in the presidential election next year.

A bitter battle is now raging in Congress over labor legislation. Regardless of the outcome of that battle, the labor question is going to be one of the burning issues of the 1948 campaign. The election could very well turn on that one issue.

In the heat of that congressional battle, you are likely to see the two great labor organizations, the CIO and the AFL, welded together in a solid front for the next campaign. In that union, it is obvious that neither love nor votes will be wasted on the Republican Party.

Suppose that labor, solidly united behind the Democratic candidate, concentrates its vote drive on 12 pivotal States in which it swings the balance of power—Pennsylvania, Illinois, California, Missouri, Kentucky, Indiana, New York, New Jersey, Ohio, Massachusetts, Texas, and Wisconsin.

Assume that this revenge campaign of labor is successful and that the Democratic candidate for President carries these 12 States, and that he gets a total popular vote of more than 25,000,000.

To offset this Democratic victory in 12 States, suppose the Republican candidate carries all the other 36 States and rolls up a thumping total of 60,000,000 in the popular vote.

After counting up these respective votes, the logical assumption would be that the final curtain had come down on the New Deal and that the Republicans would be moving into the White House next January.

Such would not be the case. An election is never won until the last vote is counted, and in this instance the electoral college casts the last vote—and the only vote that counts. We would have a Democratic President for another 4-year term.

The 12 States carried by the Democratic candidate would have 268 electoral votes. The 36 States carried by the Republicans would have 263 electoral votes.

The fact that the Republicans had piled up a 35,000,000-vote majority in the popular vote would have no bearing whatsoever on the final outcome. Thus we see that the electoral-college system, instead of protecting democracy, could actually become the instrument for its destruction.

There are many other reasons why this obsolete, dangerous, and completely illogical method of electing the President should be abolished. It concentrates too much political power in too few States. It lends itself too easily to the machinations of crooked politicians and has helped spawn the big-city bosses and their political machines. It is a constant threat to majority rule of the people, and could very readily provide the back-door entrance for the rise of a dictator in this country.

The electoral college is a relic of the stagecoach era. In fact, one of the primary reasons for its adoption in the first place was the lack of facilities for rapid communication and transportation. It took months to complete the count on the popular vote. Electors, on the other hand, could be readily determined in most States on the basis of voting trends. The rise of political parties and the emergence of the two-party system, developments which the founding fathers did not foresee, has further eliminated the need for continuing the electoral-college system.

Let me point out also that if my amendment is adopted, it will not be the first change we have made in the manner of electing the President. Originally, the Constitution provided that the candidate who received the highest electoral vote should be the President and the one receiving the next highest vote should become Vice President. The twelfth amendment to the Constitution, adopted in 1804, changed that to provide for separate ballots for each office.

I hope that the people of the United States will rise up in their might and demand the abolition of the electoral college; that they will insist upon their fundamental right to nominate and elect the President and the Vice President by a direct popular vote.

The people can have that right if they want it, and as soon as they want it. But they will never get it if they wait for the politicians to give it to them on a silver platter. They must fight for it. They must prod Congress into action. The all-important first step is to get the amendment approved by the Senate, and I hope that an aroused public opinion will bring that about at the present session.

Mr. LANGER. At the same time, Mr. President, from all over the country I received thousands of letters. I ask unanimous consent to have one of them printed in the RECORD at this point as a part of my remarks. It was written to me by Miss Ella M. Kinsley, whom I have never met. The letter is typical of a great number of letters which I received from all over America.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

PASADENA, CALIF., July 10, 1947.

Hon. WILLIAM LANGER,
United States Senator,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I have read, reread, and carefully considered your most valuable and interesting article in the magazine section of the Christian Science Monitor of June 21.

It gives me a ray of hope. For some time I have felt that it was of no use for me to vote, and yet I have kept up the habit of years.

It would be a pleasure to me to aid in the promotion of a change such as your article suggests. I am today writing to our Senator and Representative in Congress, and could write to others if I had their Washington addresses.

I have called the attention of a few friends here to the proposed change, and in my correspondence with friends in the East, will mention your plan and suggest that they write to their respective Congressmen.

The idea of the President and Vice President being elected directly by the people agrees perfectly with that of the people's section of the United Nations, which is being ably promoted by Mr. Carlyle Morgan. As you may have noticed, his reports of progress are from time to time published on the editorial page of the Christian Science Monitor.

With best wishes for a successful outcome, I am,

Very respectfully,
(Miss) ELLA M. KINSLEY.

Mr. LANGER. I have before me an editorial which appeared in the Times Leader of Wilkes-Barre, Pa., on April 17, 1947. I should like to read a few lines from the editorial:

In the 157 years since the Constitution was ratified, four amendments have been passed which affected the methods or participants of national elections. The twelfth amendment made the office of Vice President subject to election, rather than giving it to the losing candidate in the race for President. The fifteenth amendment gave the vote to Negro citizens; the seventeenth provided for popular election of Senators; the nineteenth lagalized woman suffrage.

Now Senator LANGER, of North Dakota, has proposed another change. He would give the people the privilege of selecting candidates for President and Vice President through direct national primaries conducted by both major parties.

In the rush of recent events, Mr. LANGER'S suggestion hasn't caused much popular excitement. Yet it is sound enough to merit wide discussion.

The biggest, most obvious advantage of the proposal would be to remove the chance for bosses or small political groups to frustrate the people's will. This is not the rule, but it has been done.

Theodore Roosevelt's defeat in the 1912 Republican convention was pretty clearly a defeat for rank-and-file sentiment. Warren G. Harding emerged from the fog of a smoke-filled room as a boss-picked Republican candidate in 1920. There is reason to believe that Al Smith, not John W. Davis, was the popular Democratic choice in 1924. In fact, Wendell Willkie's nomination is about the only recent example of direct public influence in picking a new candidate.

Mr. President, that was done by Tom Lamont. He went to Philadelphia and took charge, paying $25 to every man and woman who went in the gallery and shouted, "We want Willkie; we want Willkie." I say that because Republican delegates who were there told me about being participants in handling some of the money and hiring some of the people.

I ask unanimous consent that the entire editorial may be printed as part of my remarks at this point.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

DIRECT PRESIDENTIAL PRIMARIES

The twelfth amendment made the office of Vice President subject to election, rather than giving it to the losing candidate in the race for President. The fifteenth amendment gave the vote to Negro citizens; the seventeenth provided for popular election of Senators; the nineteenth legalized woman suffrage.

Now Senator LANGER, of North Dakota, has proposed another change. He would give the people the privilege of selecting candidates for President and Vice President through direct national primaries conducted by both major parties.

In the rush of recent events Mr. LANGER's suggestion hasn't caused much popular excitement. Yet it is sound enough to merit wide discussion.

The biggest, most obvious advantage of the proposal would be to remove the chance for bosses or small political groups to frustrate the people's will. This is not the rule, but it has been done.

Theodore Roosevelt's defeat in the 1912 Republican convention was pretty clearly a defeat for rank-and-file sentiment. Warren G. Harding emerged from the fog of a smoke-filled room as a boss-picked Republican candidate in 1920. There is reason to believe that Al Smith, not John W. Davis, was the popular Democratic choice in 1924. In fact, Wendell Willkie's nomination is about the only recent example of direct public influence in picking a new candidate.

Another advantage is the possibility that a presidential primary might give some voice to the impotent and virtually disfranchised Republican minority in the South. As it is now, the votes of southern delegations to Republican conventions are numerically important and politically powerless. They can be manipulated to influence, even decide, the choice of candidate without any pretense of popular representation.

Objections to the Langer proposal naturally have been raised. It has been said that primaries would give no clear majority to one candidate. It has been predicted—though this is open to serious question—that most States would simply pick a favorite son. It has also been claimed that direct primaries would destroy that geographical balance, so dear to the professional politician's heart, between the home States of the presidential candidate and his running mate.

Our technique of elections is not so perfect or the conduct of our national party conventions so high-minded as to bar any thought of change. One of our country's great needs is to make its Government function more democratically (with a lower case "d") within its republican (lower case "r") framework. It is at least worth considering whether Senator LANGER's proposal is a step in that direction.

Mr. LANGER. Mr. President, in the Committee on the Judiciary, after my amendment was offered and was defeated, I voted for the Lodge joint resolution. I wish to say very frankly that if my substitute cannot be adopted, I intend to support the Lodge joint resolution. I believe I cast the deciding vote to report the joint resolution from the Committee on the Judiciary.

I might say that this proposal is nothing new. A Democratic Senator, Senator Smith, of South Carolina, tried to get such a resolution adopted years ago, as the records of the committee will show. George Norris, of Nebraska, devoted weeks, when he was chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary, to getting this kind of an amendment to the Constitution adopted, but he could not get it through the Senate. I have read and reread every single word of the debates uttered on this floor on that subject. The measure introduced by poor George Norris was amended and amended and amended and amended upon the floor of the Senate until he could not recognize it himself. Each amendment offered, if it had been adopted, would have taken more power away from the people of the United States.

Mr. President, before we come to a vote upon this subject, I intend to speak upon it again. The speech I intend to deliver is all prepared, but I think I have said enough at this time so that any of my colleagues who are interested in giving the people the power to elect their own President will be put upon notice and will not be able to say later that my proposal came up without their knowledge, or before they had sufficient time to digest it thoroughly and study it.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. LONG in the chair). The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. LEHMAN in the chair). A quorum is present.

Mr. McMAHON. Mr. President, I wish to propose a unanimous-consent agreement to vote on the unfinished business. The unanimous-consent agreement which I propose reads as follows:

Ordered, by unanimous consent, That on the calendar day of Wednesday, February 1, 1950, at the hour of 3 o'clock p. m., the Senate proceed to vote, without further debate upon amendments to the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 2) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States providing for the election of President and Vice President, and upon the final passage of the said joint resolution: Provided, (1) That no amendment that is not germane to the subject matter of the said joint resolution shall be received; (2) that no vote on any amendment shall be taken prior to the said hour of 3 o'clock; and (3) that no amendment shall be in order which has not been formally offered or submitted as a proposed amendment prior to the hour of 1 o'clock p. m. on said day.

Ordered further, That the time between 1 o'clock and 3 o'clock p. m. on said day be equally divided between the proponents and the opponents of the said joint resolution and controlled, respectively, by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] and the Senator from Michigan [Mr. FERGUSON].

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that that proposal be agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, I notice a new phase in the proposed agreement, the phase dealing with germaneness. It is the first time it has been brought to my attention that the question of germaneness has arisen here. The requirement of germaneness has never been made by the Senate. In other words, we have never excluded amendments on the ground of nongermaneness, if they were at all in keeping with the subject matter. Notwithstanding that fact, perhaps I might not object to the unanimous-consent agreement, except that it seems to establish a precedent. If it establishes a precedent, I do not propose to agree to it. I am going to ask that that phase of the proposed agreement be stricken.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair might state to the Senator that the last unanimous-consent agreement, under which the Senate voted on the equal-rights amendment a day or two ago, contained a provision in regard to the germaneness of amendments.

Mr. McCARRAN. That may be true. I apologize for not having been present. I shall never agree to any proposed unanimous agreement which carries with it the requirement of germaneness. It has never been a part of the rules of the Senate that amendments had to be germane to the subject, and I am not going to agree to this proposal. Having stated the reasons for my objection, I object.

Mr. McMAHON. Mr. President, for the present, I withdraw the request. I should like to confer with the Senator from Nevada for a few moments, after which I may renew the request. At the present time I withdraw it.

RESIGNATION OF SENATOR VANDENBERG FROM JOINT COMMITTEE ON ATOMIC ENERGY AND APPOINTMENT OF SENATOR BRICKER

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate a communication, which he asks the Secretary to read.

The Chief Clerk read, as follows:

UNITED STATES SENATE,
Washington, D. C., January 26, 1950.

The VICE PRESIDENT,
Washington, D. C.

SIR: I present my resignation as a member of the Joint Committee on Atomic Energy.

Respectfully yours,
A. H. VANDENBERG.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair is sure that all Senators regret the resignation of the Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG] from the joint committee. At the request and on the recommendation of the Republican steering committee, and the Republican committee on committees, under a policy which they have adopted, the Chair appoints the distinguished Senator from Ohio [Mr. BRICKER].

Mr. MILLIKIN. Mr. President, in connection with the appointment of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. BRICKER] to the Joint Atomic Energy Committee, I wish to say that he was at one time a member of that committee, but lost his membership because of a change of committee ratios as the result of the change in the control of the Senate.

On January 10, this year, the Republican conference adopted the following resolution:

Where a Senator has served on a committee, and has lost his membership thereon by a change of committee ratio as a result of a change in control of the Senate, he shall have seniority over any and all other Senators to the first vacancy on the committee from which he was removed.

The recommendation of the conference of the appointment of the Senator from Ohio follows that resolution, and I may say, also, that the chairman of the committee on committees was consulted and he is entirely agreeable to the recommendation.

Mr. McMAHON. Mr. President, I should like to make a very brief statement concerning the resignation of our friend the distinguished Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG] as a member of the Joint Committee on Atomic Energy. I think I can speak for all members of that committee when I say that I very greatly regret that circumstances have dictated the Senator's resignation. His contributions to the work of the committee are known perhaps most intimately to those who are members of the Joint Committee on Atomic Energy, but I am sure they are also appreciated by the people of the United States. I am pleased, indeed, that we are going to have an opportunity, as he has assured me we shall have of consultation with him in the future work of the committee, although it may be on an entirely unofficial basis. I feel certain that all members of the committee will value that assurance.

The Senator from Ohio [Mr. BRICKER] has again become a member of the joint committee, and I am certain he will give his earnest and diligent attention to the very weighty and grave matters coming before the committee, whose wise consideration is very important to the people of the United States and, indeed, to the whole world.

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. Mr. President, as a member of the Joint Committee on Atomic Energy, and of the Special Committee of the Senate on Atomic Energy, I have been intimately associated with the senior Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG] ever since the appointment of the committees, both special and joint, on atomic energy.

I have the deepest regret that personal matters and conditions have led to the resignation from the joint committee of the Senator from Michigan. In view of his very valuable and able counsel and advice as a member of the Senate's Special Committee on Atomic Energy, and of the joint committee, and the great and far-reaching contributions his judgment and wisdom have made in the activities of the committees, continuing through for some time, I personally am sorry, as I know the other members of the joint committee are sorry, that circumstances will cause us to lose his services and advice, especially in times of doubt and difficulty in this field.

I am certain, from his statements to me, that he stands ready in any way he can to contribute his counsel and advice in the future whenever we may ask for them.

As the ranking member of the Senate side of the joint committee, I welcome the reappointment of Senator BRICKER as a member of the committee. I am sure we can look forward to cooperative action and progress in the future.

Mr. MILLIKIN. Mr. President, I, too, have served on the Atomic Energy Committee from its beginning and also on the special Senate committee which preceded it. The contributions of Senator VANDENBERG were always immensely valuable. I recall that in the formulation of the law, through his brilliance and his ability to achieve adjustments, he perhaps saved the law from becoming a source of destructive controversy. The distinguished senior Senator from Connecticut will remember that we had grave questions as to the influence to be accorded to civilian and military agencies. Senator VANDENBERG's contributions in resolving those conflicts, and in shaping a bill all of us could support, will form a very bright chapter in his great career. Since the beginning of his service on the joint committee, I can recall offhand three or four occasions when his wise counsel and courageous positions in the committee led to actions which time may show saved this country.

I wish the subject were one which could be talked about freely, so that those contributions could be assessed as of today. But that cannot be done, and I simply wish to join with my colleagues in expressing my own appreciation for the great honor of having been permitted to serve with him.

I, too, wish to say that Senator BRICKER has always been intensely interested in the subject of atomic energy. He has kept himself informed, as well as he could while off the committee, and he will again make a valuable member of it.

ORDER FOR RECESS TO MONDAY

Mr. McMAHON. Mr. President, I propose that by unanimous consent, when the Senate recesses today, it take a recess until Monday at 12 o'clock noon.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Maurer, one of its reading clerks, announced that the House had disagreed to the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 1243) to amend the Hatch Act; agreed to the conference asked by the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and that Mrs. NORTON, Mr. HARRISON, and Mr. LECOMPTE were appointed managers on the part of the House at the conference.

EXECUTIVE MESSAGES REFERRED

As in executive session,

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate messages from the President of the United States submitting sundry nominations, which were referred to the appropriate committees.

(For nominations this day received, see the end of Senate proceedings.)

EXECUTIVE REPORTS OF A COMMITTEE

As in executive session,

The following favorable reports of nominations were submitted:

By Mr. CONNALLY, from the Committee on Foreign Relations:

Edward W. Barrett, of Connecticut, to be an Assistant Secretary of State; and John Shaw Young, of New York, to be United States commissioner to the International Exposition for the Bicentennial of the Founding of Port-au-Prince, Republic of Haiti, to which office he was appointed during the last recess of the Senate.

CONFIRMATION OF NOMINATIONS IN THE ARMED SERVICES

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, as in executive session, I ask unanimous consent that certain routine nominations and promotions in the Army, Navy, and Air Force may be confirmed, and that the President be notified immediately. In support of that request, let me say the nominations come from the Committee on Armed Services unanimously. They conform to the normal, orthodox operations of the three services dealing with the uniformed officers.

In addition to the nominations of the service officers there is the nomination of Mr. Karl R. Bendetsen, of California, to be Assistant Secretary of the Army, and I include him in the recommendation, at the request of the Secretary of the Army and the committee, for the following reason: The law provides that Assistant Secretaries shall serve on boards and commissions. Mr. Bendetsen has been serving on certain boards and commissions by direction of the Secretary of War since last August, but, strictly speaking, he is not in a legal status to serve on them, because his nomination has not been confirmed. The Secretary of the Army is anxious to have it confirmed so as, speaking in a humorous way, to make the Secretary of the Army honest and compliant with the law. Mr. Bendetsen has the highest recommendations, particularly from the junior Senator from California [Mr. KNOWLAND], who knows him. I ask that his nomination be included in the unanimous-consent request.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, my understanding is these are the usual routine nominations.

Mr. TYDINGS. That is correct.

Mr. WHERRY. The reason for their confirmation in this manner is that it is quite expensive to print the lists, and it obviates much detail, if it can be done without objection. I did not hear all the remarks of the distinguished Senator from Maryland. I was conversing with the Senator from Nevada. I should like to ask the distinguished Senator, does the report from the Armed Services Committee unanimously recommend the confirmations?

Mr. TYDINGS. It does.

Mr. WHERRY. And the one exception the distinguished Senator has called to our attention also comes in that way, does it?

Mr. TYDINGS. It does.

Mr. WHERRY. I have no objection.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the confirmation en bloc of all these nominations? The Chair hears none, and the nominations are confirmed. Without objection, the President will be notified immediately.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, as in legislative session——

Mr. McMAHON. Mr. President, will the Senator from Maryland yield to me for a moment, while the Senate is proceeding as in executive session?

Mr. TYDINGS. I will be through in a moment. But I will yield to the Senator, if he wants something done as in executive session.

NOMINATIONS IN UNITED STATES COAST GUARD, COAST AND GEODETIC SURVEY, AND INTERSTATE COMMERCE COMMISSION

Mr. McMAHON. Mr. President, there has been handed to me the Executive Calendar for Thursday, January 26, which contains routine nominations in the Coast Guard, the Geodetic Survey, and also the nomination for Mr. James E. Friend to be Assistant Director of Locomotive Inspection in the Interstate Commerce Commission. I ask unanimous consent that, as in executive session, these nominations be confirmed and that the President be notified.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the nominations are confirmed, and the President will be notified.

EUROPEAN COORDINATING COMMITTEE—LT. COL. CHARLES H. BONESTEEL

The Senate resumed the consideration of legislative business.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, when the arms-implementation bill was passed provision was made for the European Coordinating Committee and for the Office of Executive Director to administer the program. The President is anxious to nominate a lieutenant colonel in the Army by the name of Charles H. Bonesteel, who has had a long connection with the program. It turns out that if he accepts the position of director he will forfeit certain promotions, pensions, and retirement rights which he now has as a member of the armed services. We have tried to find if it were not legally possible to appoint him to this office without legislation. The best legal advice we can get is that if he accepts the nomination he will forfeit some of his retirement and military rights as an officer in the United States Army.

Therefore, today, since this officer is already administering the program unofficially, in the Armed Services Committee, we were requested to ask that the Senate bill 2911, which has been reported from the committee unanimously, be passed, so that the House may act on it and the President may send to the Senate in due time a regular formal nomination which will then have to be acted on by the Senate. The bill is S. 2911, to authorize the President to appoint Lt. Col. Charles H. Bonesteel as Executive Director of the European Coordinating Committee under the Mutual Defense Assistance Act of 1949, without affecting his military status and perquisites.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. TYDINGS. I will yield to the Senator in a moment. The bill is simply permissive, and allows him to accept the position without losing his Army standing in the promotion list, retirement list, and so forth.

Mr. WHERRY. Is the bill on the calendar?

Mr. TYDINGS. The bill is on the calendar, having been reported favorably by the Armed Services Committee unanimously.

Mr. WHERRY. When was it reported?

Mr. TYDINGS. It was reported today. The reason I am asking for its immediate consideration is that it is desired to appoint this man. The bill has to pass both Houses before he can be appointed.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

Mr. TYDINGS. I yield.

Mr. WHERRY. Does the bill establish a precedent of any kind?

Mr. TYDINGS. It does not.

Mr. WHERRY. Is it merely permissive, and does it apply only to this individual?

Mr. TYDINGS. He is named in the bill.

Mr. WHERRY. What happens after the act itself has terminated?

Mr. TYDINGS. He goes back to his place in the Army. He does not want to lose his standing because of the service on the Coordinating Committee.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, I am in complete sympathy with the bill. I think it is a constructive piece of legislation, and I have no objection to its immediate consideration.

Mr. TOBEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. TYDINGS. I yield.

Mr. TOBEY. I was interested in the colloquy in which the distinguished minority leader asked whether a precedent would be established, and the Senator from Maryland said it would not.

Mr. TYDINGS. That is correct.

Mr. TOBEY. I point out that establishing precedents is a concomitant of progress.

Mr. TYDINGS. It was Emerson who said, "A foolish consistency is the hobgoblin of little minds." But none of us have little minds.

Mr. TOBEY. Oh, no.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will state the bill by title.

The CHIEF CLERK. A bill (S. 2911) to authorize the President to appoint Lt. Col. Charles H. Bonesteel as Executive Director of the European Coordinating Committee under the Mutual Defense Assistance Act of 1949, without affecting his military status and perquisites.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the bill was considered, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That, notwithstanding the existing provisions of law or any rules or regulations issued thereunder, the President, acting by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, is authorized to appoint Lt. Col. Charles H. Bonesteel, an officer in the Army of the United States, as Executive Director of the European Coordinating Committee and Lieutenant Colonel Bonesteel's appointment to, acceptance of, and service as such Executive Director of the European Coordinating Committee shall in no way affect any status, office, rank, or grade he may occupy or hold in the Army of the United States or any component thereof, or any emolument, perquisite, right, privilege, eligibility for promotion, or benefit incident to or arising out of any such status, office, rank, or grade: Provided, That so long as he remains Executive Director of the European Coordinating Committee, Lieutenant Colonel Bonesteel shall retain the rank and grade of lieutenant colonel which he now holds in the Army of the United States, but during such time shall receive the salary and allowances as Executive Director of the European Coordinating Committee as one of the persons authorized to be employed under section 406 (e) of the Mutual Defense Assistance Act of 1949, payable from funds made available by law for the Department of State, in lieu of his military pay and allowances.

SEC. 2. In the performance of his duties as Executive Director of the European Coordinating Committee, Lieutenant Colonel Bonesteel shall be subject to no supervision, control, restriction, or prohibition, military or otherwise, other than would be operative with respect to him if he were in no way connected with the Department of Defense or the Army of the United States or any component thereof.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Maryland what the colloquy between him and the Senator from New Hampshire had to do with the bill.

Mr. TYDINGS. Anything a Senator says to the Senator from Maryland while the Senator from Maryland is endeavoring to have passed an important piece of legislation deserves the utmost consideration.

PROPOSED CHANGE IN METHOD OF ELECTION OF PRESIDENT AND VICE PRESIDENT

The Senate resumed the consideration of the resolution (S. J. Res. 2) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States providing for the election of President and Vice President.

Mr. McMAHON. Mr. President, a conference has been held with the Senator from Nevada [Mr. MCCARRAN] and it has been explained to him that there is no desire to create any precedent if the Senate agrees to the form of unanimous-consent request which I have previously read. I now understand that the Senator from Nevada will withdraw his objection.

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, on the basis of the statement that no precedent will be established by the approval of the proposed unanimous-consent agreement, I withdraw any objection I had.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It might be useful to the Senate to state that every unanimous-consent agreement stands on its own basis. It establishes no precedent, because any Senator may object to any unanimous-consent request at any time.

Mr. McCARRAN. That is entirely correct, Mr. President, but when the statement is hurled back that a Senator has agreed to this unanimous-consent request in the past, and therefore he should not disagree now, it puts that Senator in a corner, so to speak; and I do not propose to be put into a corner unless I control the corner.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, I want to thank the distinguished Senator from Nevada for withdrawing his objection to the unanimous-consent request. As the Chair has already observed, of course the distinguished Senator can object to the next unanimous-consent request. But I think the Senator has raised a good point. I personally want to thank him in this particular instance for withdrawing his objection.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the unanimous-consent request is agreed to.

Mr. FERGUSON. Mr. President——

Mr. HUMPHREY. I have another matter.

Mr. FERGUSON. Very well.

STAKE OF THE UNITED STATES IN FORMOSA

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, in view of the prolonged discussion which has occurred on the floor of the Senate with reference to the Chinese situation, and particularly as to Formosa, I should like to have included in the body of the RECORD a very important article published in the Cleveland Plain Dealer and written by Fletcher Knebel, who has brought to our attention some of the economic values at stake in Formosa which might have some influence upon some of the statements pertaining to American foreign policy with regard to Formosa.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

TWENTY-MILLION-DOLLAR STAKE IN FORMOSA HELD IN UNITED STATES

(By Fletcher Knebel)

WASHINGTON, January 21.—American investors have a stake of more than $20,000,000 in the embattled island of Formosa, Government sources disclosed today.

Private United States capital, it was learned, was chiefly responsible for the development of extensive electric power installations on the 14,000-square-mile island.

Hopes of recapturing a share of the original investment are dwindling as the chunk of land 100 miles off the Chinese mainland becomes a prize in the struggle between opposing Chinese Nationalists and Communists.

Formosa has been the center of a swirling foreign policy debate since President Truman rejected Republican demands that United States forces bar the island to Chinese Communists expected to invade from the mainland.

The island, held by Japan during the development period, was turned over to Nationalist China in 1945 following agreements at Cairo and Potsdam. In recent months it has served as a haven for Chiang Kai-shek and other Nationalist leaders who fled the Red sweep through China proper.

STAKE DATES BACK TO 1931

The American financial stake in Formosa, it was revealed, dates back to 1931 when the Taiwan Electric Light & Power Co. of Japan floated a bond issue in this country.

The Japanese power company was named for the island it developed. Taiwan is the official local name as contrasted with the western use of Formosa, a Portuguese word meaning "beautiful."

Seeking American capital in 1931, officials of Taiwan Light & Power floated a bond issue of $22,800,000 in this country.

The issue was handled by J. P. Morgan & Co., Kuhn Loeb & Co., the National City Co., the First National Bank of New York, and the Yokohama Specie Bank, Ltd., of New York.

The bonds, in blocks of $1,000, were purchased for the most part by "well heeled" investors along the eastern seaboard.

The bonds, according to information supplied by Fitch Publishing Co., Inc., bore interest at 5½ percent with a maturity date of July 1, 1971.

SOLD AS HIGH AS $104

At the time of issue the bonds were guaranteed as to principal and interest by the Government of Japan. The $100 par bonds were offered at $93.50 and fetched as high as $104 during the thirties.

In the last year of trading before Pearl Harbor, however, the price fluctuated from a high of 50¾ to a low of 34.

The New York Stock Exchange suspended trading in the security on December 12, 1941, and since that time the Securities and Exchange Commission's ban on trading in securities of enemy countries has applied to the Taiwan issue.

Taiwan Light & Power used the American capital to good advantage, building nine hydroelectric plants and three steam generating plants on the island.

When trading in the bonds ended in this country, there were still $20,151,000 worth outstanding in the hands of American investors who had received interest regularly from 1931 through 1941.

While there is no evidence that the American financial stake inspired phases of the debate over Formosa, eventual control of the island does effect chances of the bondholders in gaining a settlement.

As long as the island remains in Nationalist Chinese hands, the American investors have a chance of being paid off eventually, according to State Department sources.

Should the island fall into Chinese Communist hands, however, there is no assurance whatever that the bonds will be worth more than the paper.

Government sources say there is doubt as to whether the foreign share of the Taiwan issue is now an obligation of the Japanese or the Nationalist Chinese. The subject would have to be resolved in final treaty arrangements.

With Formosa in the hands of Chinese Communists, however, any such discussion would be purely academic.

AMENDMENT OF DISPLACED PERSONS ACT—LEAVE TO FILE MINORITY VIEWS

Mr. FERGUSON. I ask unanimous consent that the members of the Committee on the Judiciary may have consent of the Senate to file minority views, if they desire, on the bill (H. R. 4567) to amend the Displaced Persons Act of 1948, which bill was reported on January 25, yesterday, in compliance with the order of the Senate.

Mr. McMAHON. Mr. President, I inquire if the Senator has discussed the matter with the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary?

Mr. FERGUSON. I have.

Mr. McMAHON. I have no objection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

PROGRESS IN CANCER RESEARCH

Mr. SMITH of New Jersey. Mr. President, as one who has always taken a special interest in the advancement of the national health—and my interest is a personal one, because I am the son of a physician—I wish to pay tribute at this time to those devoted workers throughout the country, and particularly in my own State of New Jersey, who are engaged in the long battle against the terrible disease of cancer. Nearly 200,000 Americans die every year from this baffling disease, and it is heartening to reflect that determined and increasingly successful efforts are being made not only to control it but also to discover its fundamental cause and cure.

The American Cancer Society is foremost among the volunteer organizations waging this war on cancer. This group has enlisted Nation-wide financial support, and has already made some $6,000,000 in grants for cancer research. Government, too, has been active in this research effort, particularly through the National Cancer Institute, as the present Presiding Officer [Mr. HUMPHREY in the chair], who is a member with me of the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare, will recall.

In addition to research, educational programs are being carried on by both public and private agencies. The emphasis in these programs is on the need for detection of cancer in its early stages, when surgery, X-ray or radium treatments can still be helpful. People are especially urged to visit their family physicians at regular intervals. We have reports that increasing numbers of cases are being found in early stages, indicating that this educational effort is bearing fruit, and establishing a first line of defense against cancer.

The New Jersey division of the American Cancer Society, in my own State of New Jersey, under the very able presidency of Mr. George E. Stringfellow, has been especially active and successful in this educational aspect of the fight on cancer. I desire to pay tribute to Mr. Stringfellow and his associates for the very capable and generous leadership which they have given to this cause.

A particularly noteworthy feature of the New Jersey division's program is the annual editorial contest conducted among the daily and weekly newspapers of the State. Every year Mr. Stringfellow presents a plaque to one daily newspaper and one weekly newspaper for the best editorials of the year on this important subject. This contest has contributed materially to the high level of interest in the fight against cancer among the newspapers and the general public in New Jersey.

The winning editorials for the year 1949 were chosen by a board of judges from among more than 300 New Jersey newspapers. The award in the daily field was won by the Paterson Evening News, of which my friend, Mr. Harry B. Hames, is editor, and in the weekly field by the Westwood Chronicle, of which my friend, Mr. E. S. Guild, is editor.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that these two winning editorials on this important subject of cancer control be inserted in the RECORD as a part of my remarks, together with a list of those papers, with the names of their editors, receiving honorable mention in the contest.

There being no objection, the editorials and the list were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Paterson (N. J.) News of April 5, 1949]

THE LORD IS GOOD TO HIS CHILDREN, BUT HE WANTS HIS CHILDREN TO BE GOOD TO OTHERS AS WELL

Let's pull up a chair, folks, and have a friendly little chat.

The weather's fine, spring is here, trees and grass are growing green, the little flowers beginning to burst through the buds.

All's well with the world, isn't it? Mother all right? Dad in tiptop condition? Children nimble and active?

God's good to you children, isn't He? Good health, enough of the world's goods to provide the little comforts that go to make for a happy contented brood.

You retired last night, all of you, with a prayer for a good night and a safe awakening. Came the morning, and mother was well and able to prepare a nice piping hot breakfast, the kids were around the house romping with the exuberance of youth. And dad was off to work for another busy day.

It's a pretty picture, isn't it? And for all these bounties, we thank the Lord for His grace and continue to pray that nothing may mar the tranquillity of the home.

Now let's face reality.

One of every eight persons in America is stricken with cancer. The dread killer takes the lives of 200,000 people in this country. When we speak of people, we don't mean abstract individuals, far removed from our neighborly scene. Those 200,000 people include our very own, members of our families, our neighbors. Even now, while you read this message, someone you know is either dying with the dreaded scourge, or is being afflicted.

Have you ever stood by the bedside of a person stricken with cancer? Have you seen the pain, the anguish, the pleading in their eyes for some relief from the unbearable distress? Have you seen the frame of some person who a few brief months before was healthy and alive and filled with the love of life, melting away as snow vanishes before the rays of the sun?

And seeing the loved one fading as if from your very grasp, had the feeling of complete and desperate futility because you haven't been able to help? And wished you could swap places, you to suffer, the loved one to be spared the indescribable horror of it all?

What's money to you, neighbor? It's only a medium civilized man has devised with which to purchase the little niceties the good Lord is able to spare to each of us, His children.

But money, properly placed, can do a magnificent job.

It can, for instance, help open and build up the clinics where those who are stricken can go for some relief.

It can make available a place where a stricken parent can take a child to be diagnosed, where a mother or a father can go to learn what's wrong, and learning, do something about it.

In Passaic County, for instance, the American Cancer Society seeks a miserly $68,310. Paterson's share would be $28,000.

Why, we in this city spend that much, undoubtedly, in a day for a fleeting pleasure-bender.

But the heroic campaigners seeking these paltry sums can't even raise these small sums unless you and you and we give to the cause.

Of the $68,310, 50 percent stays right here at home, for diagnosis, for clinics, for treatments. Of whom? Why, neighbor, of you and your family and your friends. The balance goes to the great fight to meet the killer face to face, God willing, in the not so distant future.

There are some mighty busy people giving of their time and energies to raise these funds. Such a man, for instance, as Jack Stern, the Paterson chairman, who is busily occupied in so many civic and charitable enterprises. He can give his money, and his time, and his health, too. So, too, with Leo Eirich, the county chairman.

Surely, the least you and you and we can do is to give as generously as we can to help lighten their task and help, perhaps, restore hope to someone stricken with cancer.

One out of eight people of the country faces the dastardly menace—one out of every eight people in Paterson, in Passaic County, in America.

Do you feel well neighbor?

Thank God, and then send in your check or bring in your contribution to the Paterson Cancer Campaign Committee, at 169 Van Houten Street, Paterson.

[From the Westwood (N. J.) Chronicle]

TAKE HIM HOME TO DIE

(Winning editorial in the weekly newspaper field, 1949, editorial contest of the New Jersey Division, American Cancer Society)

It is not difficult to write an editorial on cancer when one's own father was a victim of the dread disease. It is true that he was 81 years of age, but it is also true that the surgeons, after an autopsy, declared that he had the vital organs of a man of 60.

Early in March, some years ago, we talked with him. He had been sent home from a Boston hospital to die. Our mother had been instructed in the best methods of making things as easy as possible for him for the few months that he had to live.

"Son," he said, "I don't mind dying. I've had my life. It's just this dying by inches that I don't like. And it's going to be tough on your mother."

He lingered on until the middle of July—dying by inches. Of course, he suffered—in spite of the opiates.

If he had been 51 instead of 81 his death would have been a tragedy to all who knew him. His advanced years made death a more natural thing—less poignant, less pitiful.

Most of us have quite a few years to go before we reach 81. And we have some hope that if cancer does strike in the next 5 or 10 years the scourge will have been conquered—and our lives will have been saved.

Whether we are 60, 70, or 80 we don't want the doctor, after proper examination, to say to our loved ones: "There is no hope. Take him home to die."

War has been declared against cancer. This month is Cancer Control Month. The American Cancer Society, through its New Jersey division, is waging a valiant battle against this public enemy, right here in our own State.

It takes money to win any war. No price is too high to win the war against cancer. It's everyone's fight—and everyone's help is vitally needed.

Mr. McMAHON. Mr. President, would the Senator from Michigan prefer

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

THURSDAY, JANUARY 26, 1950

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

Rev. Bernard Braskamp, D. D., pastor of the Gunton-Temple Memorial Presbyterian Church, Washington, D. C., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, Thou art man's refuge in the stillness of the night and his strength in the struggles of each new day.

We are again approaching Thy throne through the old and familiar way of prayer which is never closed to those who come with a humble spirit and a contrite heart.

May this be a day of unclouded vision when we shall see more clearly the peerless worth of the ideals and principles of democracy and the certainty of their ultimate triumph.

Grant that our President, our Speaker, and all the chosen representatives of our beloved country may have the guidance of Thy spirit in their deliberations and decisions.

Inspire them with those desires which Thou dost delight to satisfy and may they hold their own wishes in abeyance until Thou dost declare Thy will.

May we be loyal partners with all who are seeking to bring in that glorious day when men and nations everywhere shall walk together the highways of brotherhood and good will.

Hear us in the name of the Prince of Peace. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

INDIAN CONSTITUTION DAY

Mrs. BOLTON of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentlewoman from Ohio?

There was no objection.

Mrs. BOLTON of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, it is with a deep sense of joy that I pay tribute and honor to the people of India who are celebrating this day, January 26, 1950, as Constitution Day, marking the inauguration of a new constitution which transforms their great country into a sovereign democratic republic—another milestone in the long march of man toward self-government and freedom.

All over the world men are reaching out to find formulas for self-government. All over the world men are seeking freedom from the domination of concentrated power and alien control. After 200 years of British rule, India is taking her place among the nations as a free, independent republic.

People of India, we of this young Republic of the New World welcome you into the sunlight of responsible citizenship.

How reminiscent is this of our own early days of 160 years ago, when 13 sovereign States joined together for mutual benefit and common strength, in order to form a more perfect union. We believe that men can govern themselves, indeed our whole political and economic structure is built upon that certainty.

We know that a nation is not a tangible thing that can be built with hands. We know that a nation is not its laws, its customs, its behavior, or even its history. It is more an echo of the past and a whisper from the future, the whole bound together with the lives, the hopes, and the endeavors of millions of men and women.

We hold the individual to be of importance because we know, even as do the people of India, that the individual is part and parcel of the Infinite One, from whom all doth proceed and to whom all must return. We believe that the varying paths men choose to take, according to their individual ideals and aspirations, are as mountain streams which, though having their sources in different places, ultimately mingle their waters in the same great sea.

I know that I am expressing the sense of this great body of which I am a Member, the House of Representatives of the United States of America, when I extend our hand across the world and grasp yours in true brotherhood, with a deep understanding of your need to work out your own pattern of freedom. We pray the Infinite One that His blessing may rest upon each one of you, upon the government you are establishing, and upon Rajendra Prasad, your first president, under whose able leadership you will go forward.

In this hour, pregnant with the need for spiritual guidance of freemen everywhere, may our two Nations press forward together, and in the words of our own Abraham Lincoln:

With firmness in the right as God gives us to see the right * * * strive on to finish the work we are in.

CALENDAR WEDNESDAY BUSINESS

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. RANKIN. Is it in order for any Member to move to dispense with Calendar Wednesday business at any time?

The SPEAKER. With the Chair's recognition; yes.

Mr. MARCANTONIO. A further parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MARCANTONIO. Must not that motion be made on Wednesdays, or can it be made at any time?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the proper time to make the motion would be on Wednesday, when the proper time arrives.

Mr. RANKIN. We have been dispensing with Calendar Wednesday business by unanimous consent days ahead.

The SPEAKER. That is by unanimous consent.

Mr. RANKIN. The point I am raising is whether or not it would be in order to move to dispense with Calendar Wednesday business before Wednesday.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks a Member should wait until Wednesday to make that motion.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. MULTER asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD in three instances and include extraneous matter.

Mr. MANSFIELD asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include an article on the Marine Corps.

Mr. BECKWORTH asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD in regard to the Sabine watershed in Texas.

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. ROGERS of Florida. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Florida?

There was no objection.

[Mr. ROGERS of Flordia addressed the House. His remarks appear in the Appendix.]

THE COTTON BILL

Mr. BECKWORTH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

Mr. BECKWORTH. Mr. Speaker, I think tomorrow the cotton bill will be before this House for consideration. I have been in touch with the Department of Agriculture and asked them if they have information, county by county, throughout the cotton-growing area of this Nation as to how much, substantially, the new proposal we shall vote on will give to each county. In the main the Department has this information. I think that any Member who has a cotton-acreage problem could well afford to take the time to find out approximately how much the legislation will help his distressed county or counties. It is my hope a live-and-let-live law will be the result of the work of this Congress this session.

Mr. Speaker, I include some letters I have received from Texas:

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE,
PRODUCTION AND MARKETING ADMINISTRATION,
Abilene, Tex., January 18, 1950.

Re memo of January 14, 1950.
Representative LINDLEY BECKWORTH,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. BECKWORTH: The County Committee of Taylor County, Tex., reserved the full percent of the 1950 cotton allotment for adjusting genuine cotton farms.

The amendment setting up 70 percent of the average actual acreage (as adjusted to BAE) planted in 1946, 1947, and 1948 will give Taylor County approximately 4,000 additional acres of cotton allotment.

Taylor County needs an additional 15,000 acres to keep genuine cotton producers farming.

The amendment referred to above will alleviate our troubles if BAE figures are not used but if the BAE figures are used it will help some individual farmers and hurt some worse than we are now, thus increasing the administrative problems.

Very truly yours,

PMA TAYLOR COUNTY COMMITTEE,
W. O. HIGGINS,
G. L. STEWART,
Members.

(Copies to Hon. W. R. POAGE, Hon. OMAR BURLESON.)

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE,
PRODUCTION AND MARKETING ADMINISTRATION,
Garden City, Tex., January 17, 1950.

Hon. LINDLEY BECKWORTH,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. BECKWORTH: With reference to your letter of January 13, 1950, our county committee did not reserve the full percent because we did not wish new growers to have a larger cotton allotment than old growers. We reserved 5 percent. The 70 percent amendment would not give us any additional acreage. It would hurt us worse if BAE figures must be used.

Cotton acreage, 1946:
BAE figures	2,670
Farmer figures	5,253
Cotton acreage, 1947:
BAE figures	5,200
Farmer figures	8,644
Cotton acreage, 1948:
Farmer figures	13,043

We have in Glasscock County 102 cotton farms eligible for an old-grower cotton allotment. These farms have an adjusted cropland acreage of approximately 23,100 acres. Two-thirds of our cotton farms join Midland and Howard Counties, lying just to the south of these counties and having the same type of sandy-loam soil. (These counties have allotment ratios around 45 to 47 percent; we have a ratio of nearly 20 percent.) One-third of our farms, located in the south part of the county, have been put into cultivation in the last 3 years, beginning with the year 1947. These farms are farmed by young veterans, and there are GI loans on 25 farms in this area. Their crop has been and is 95 percent cotton. These veterans are, of course, clearing more land every day to put into cultivation. They have had a gin in their community for the last 2 years. There is no other gin in the county, and cotton from the north part of the county continues to be ginned in Martin and Howard Counties.

Our trouble lies entirely with the BAE figures. Until September 1949, when we started checking with them on their figures, they had no record of a gin in this county. At that time their records showed that Glasscock County had ginned a total of 299 bales of cotton in 1948. After our county gin sent them a report they corrected their figures to 1,099 bales. Since the latter part of November we have checked 13 out-of-county gins in an attempt to get additional corrections from them. We do not know whether or not we have been successful, since the gin statements mailed to them on December 16 have not been acknowledged. We have found that records for these gins have been scattered from Lubbock to Sweetwater to San Angelo, and it is always necessary that a personal visit be made before we can secure access to the records.

Yes; we do need additional cotton acreage to keep genuine cotton farmers and genuine cotton tenants farming. We need a minimum addition of 5,000 acres.

We will appreciate all aid you can give us. We have not heard of any proposed amendment that will help us if we must use present BAE figures.

Very truly yours,

ASTA M. ALLEN,
Secretary, Glasscock County PMA.

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE,
PRODUCTION AND MARKETING ADMINISTRATION,
San Antonio, Tex., January 18, 1950.

Representative LINDLEY BECKWORTH,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: This is with reference to your letters dated January 10 and January 12 concerning cotton allotments in Bexar County.

Bexar County received a cotton allotment of 5,283 acres. The allotment was based on the cotton actually planted in the county during the years 1947 and 1948. In 1947 and 1948 we had 210 farms on which cotton was planted. Regulations required that this allotment be distributed to 522 farms. Our final county factor is 0.0847.

The amendment proposed by Houston County would give Bexar County approximately 2,000 acres of additional allotment.

We have 26 acres to be distributed to new cotton farms. To date we have 8 farms applying for new grower allotments.

The county committee reserved the full percentage that they were permitted to reserve for adjustments.

Our present cotton allotments will put Bexar County farmers out of the cotton business. The additional acres of cotton that Bexar County will need will depend on the method of distribution of the acreage.

In my opinion equitable allotments can never be established by applying a factor to cropland acreage for this method of establishing allotments will force the farmer planting a higher percent of his land to cotton to take all of the reduction and the farmer planting a low percent of his land to cotton will take no reduction.

Trusting that this will give you the desired information, I am,

Yours very truly,

C. A. KING,
Administrative Officer,
Bexar County PMA.

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE,
PRODUCTION AND MARKETING ADMINISTRATION,
Menard, Tex., January 17, 1950.

Hon. LINDLEY BECKWORTH,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR FRIEND: In reply to your letter of January 13, will state that Menard County committee did not reserve any percent of cotton allotment because our allotment was too small.

Our official county allotment was 332 acres for 1950, where our 1942 allotment was 3,042 acres. Our highest war-crop credits of planted acreage in years 1946, 1947, and 1948 was 1,522 acres whereas 70 percent of this would give us an allotment acreage of 1,065 acres or additional 733 acres but if we have to use the BAE established acreage we would still be out.

Our present allotment is going to ruin our cotton farmers and tenant farmers who depended on cotton for cash crops on farms.

If there could be a clause written in law whereby farms that are going out of production be adjusted downward and farms going into production be adjusted upward it would help a lot.

Thanking you for asking for this information and we hope the information given will help our farmers.

Very truly yours,

BEN P. PALMER,
Chairman, Menard County PMA Committee.

RAY R. ELLIS,
Vice Chairman, Menard County PMA Committee.

IRVIN POOL,
Member, Menard County PMA Committee.

FRANCIS W. KIDD,

Congressman LINDLEY BECKWORTH,
Third District, Texas,
Congress of the United States,
Washington, D. C.

HONORABLE MR. BECKWORTH: With reference to your letter of January 14, 1950.

The Wilson County PMA committee held the full 15 percent for reserve to be distributed to genuine cotton growers, or, to those who planted cotton in 1946, 1947, and 1948. With that small reserve it was still not enough to increase the individual allotment to where they would have enough cotton acreage to justify planting.

With reference to how many acres Wilson County would receive, should the amendment you mentioned in your letter carry, it is impossible for me to say, but, I am sure it will allow more acreage than the plan we now have.

In 1942 the cotton allotment was 33,000 acres; 1950, area I, 5,916 acres; area II, 206 acres. This was divided among 793 farms, about half of this number received their allotment due to war crop credits and they planted cotton in 1941 only. The cotton acreage factor for area I is .0621 and for area II, it is .0175, you can readily see with such low factors what kind of cotton allotment each could receive.

Our county certainly needs additional acreage, especially for those who have planted cotton regularly every year. I talked with two of our committeemen today and they agreed and thought about 8,000 additional acres would in all probability be enough for distribution to the genuine cotton farmers.

We think every part of our farm program is good, and, all agree that we need acreage allotments to maintain prices received for farm commodities, and, too, we hope our cotton-allotment deal will be corrected to where it will be satisfactory to all concerned.

We thank you for your interest and sincerely appreciate your efforts in trying to correct the distribution of individual cotton allotments.

Sincerely yours,

WILLIAM E. MOSS,
Secretary, Wilson County PMA.

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE,
PRODUCTION AND MARKETING ADMINISTRATION,
Livingston, Tex., January 18, 1950.

Representative LINDLEY BECKWORTH,
New House Office Building,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: We are unable to answer your question with reference to the 10-percent reserve. If such reserve was made it was done by the State PMA office.

We should like to call your attention to the BAE figure which Polk County and all other counties had to use in making adjustments for cotton planted in 1945, 1946, 1947, and 1948.

The BAE figures for the years in question are out of line with the information taken by our reporters last spring. Should we be forced to use the BAE acreage figures for those years it is not believed that a 50 or 70 percent plan will help.

Will you please explain why we spent so much time and money interviewing farmers and having them file a 532–C, and then at a later date we are asked to reduce the figures submitted by the farmers to agree with a BAE estimate?

Very truly yours,

J. G. BROCK,
Chairman, Polk County PMA Committee.

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE,
PRODUCTION AND MARKETING ADMINISTRATION,
Throckmorton, Tex., January 17, 1950.

Hon. LINDLEY BECKWORTH,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Throckmorton County Cotton Committee reserved the full percent for the county reserve. The amendment whereby the farmer can receive 70 percent of acreage (adjusted to BAE figures) will require 515 additional acres, which will not materially help this county. The greatest help in this county, and probably all other counties, would be that the counties be allowed to count the actual acres instead of bringing them to BAE figures. Also, the actual acres reported by the farmers should be more accurate than BAE figures according to the farmers in the county.

This county needs additional cotton acreage to keep genuine cotton farmers and genuine cottoh tenants farming. An additional amount of 1,500 acres is badly needed for this purpose.

Very truly yours,

ZADA K. HETHCOCK,
Secretary, Throckmorton County PMA Committee.

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE,
PRODUCTION AND MARKETING ADMINISTRATION,
Fredericksburg, Tex., January 16, 1950.

Hon. LINDLEY BECKWORTH,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. BECKWORTH: This is in reply to your letter dated January 13 with reference to 1950 cotton-acreage allotments in Gillespie County.

The county committee reserved the maximum 15 percent of the original 330 acres allotted to the county. The amendment setting up 70 percent of the actual acreage, including war crops in 1946, 1947, and 1948, would increase our acreage approximately 60 acres.

The only way cotton farmers would be benefited in Gillespie County would be if the law were amended to provide for releasing acreage and reapportioning it to producers wanting to plant cotton in 1950.

Very truly yours,

WESLEY A. GOLD,
Secretary, Gillespie County PMA.

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE,
PRODUCTION AND MARKETING ADMINISTRATION,
Ballinger, Tex., January 17, 1950.

Hon. LINDLEY BECKWORTH,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Listed below please find the information as requested in your letter of January 13, 1950.

1. Did your county committee reserve the full percent you could reserve? Yes.

2. What percent did you reserve? Fifteen percent.

3. How many additional acres will the enclosed amendment give your county? None.

Farmers' actual acreage

1946	96,758
1947	103,657
1948	113,788
Total	314,203

Divide the total acreage by 3, we get 104,734. Multiply 104,734 times 70 percent, would be 73,313.8.

4. Does your county need any additional cotton acreage to keep genuine cotton farmers and genuine cotton tenants farming? Yes.

5. How many acres? Fifteen thousand.

We believe that if our county had been given credit for war-crop credits for the years 1945, 1946, and 1947 that would alleviate our trouble, but if the BAE figures are used we would be hurt more.

Your very truly,

SYLVAN E. CLONINGER,
Secretary, Runnels County PMA.

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE,
PRODUCTION AND MARKETING ADMINISTRATION,
Comanche, Tex., January 17, 1950.

Hon. LINDLEY BECKWORTH,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: This is in reply to your letter of January 13, 1950, asking for additional information regarding 1950 cotton-acreage allotments for Comanche County, Tex.

Our county committee did reserve the full 15 percent as allowed under amended Public Law 439, Eighty-first Congress.

An amendment to the present law setting up 70 percent of the farmer's actual acreage in 1946–47–48 would alleviate a lot of our troubles; but if the BAE figures are used, we would not be helped any.

Our county does need additional cotton acreage to keep genuine cotton farmers and genuine cotton tenants farming. We feel that if Comanche County could receive an additional 500 acres and that if we were allowed to allocate this to actual cotton farmers that our county would be in good shape.

An amendment to the effect that if unused cotton acreage could be released and reallocated to cotton farmers it would help our county to some extent.

We trust this is the information you desire.

Very truly yours,

O. D. JOHNSTON,
Acting Administrative Officer,
Comanche County PMA.

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE,
PRODUCTION AND MARKETING ADMINISTRATION,
Marshall, Tex., January 18, 1950.

Hon. LINDLEY BECKWORTH,
New House Office Building,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. BECKWORTH: The Harrison County PMA Committee set aside a reserve of 14 percent of the county 1950 cotton acreage. The bulk of this was used in adjustments for 5- to 10- to 15-acre farms and most of the rest was used for adjustments on larger farms where the cut was unusually severe.

The amendment to limit the cut to 70 percent of the 1946–1947–1948 average, or 50 percent of the highest planted year would give Harrison County 1,200 additional acres if the cotton history used is the history after cutting the county to BAE figures.

With the present allotments there will be up to 200 or 300 genuine cotton farmers, mainly tenants that cannot be furnished by the banks or others and be forced off the farms or into odd jobs, and so forth. It would take 1,500 to 2,500 additional acres to keep them farming.

We believe the most or all of these acres can be secured by reallocating allotments that will not be used, particularly if those with unneeded allotments can be assured that they will not be penalized if they voluntarily turn in their acres to the county committee for this purpose.

Another real problem here, and I believe all over East Texas, is the large number of good farms without allotments. Potentially there are 2,000 in Harrison County and we expect at least 300 applications for new growers' allotments with not enough acres to give any of them enough to justify planting.

We all deeply appreciate your efforts toward solving our problems.

Yours very truly,

WALCOTT S. BLACK,
Administrative Officer, Harrison County PMA.

Re: Cotton-acreage allotment.

Hon. LINDLEY BECKWORTH,
Representative, Third District of Texas, Washington, D. C.:

Our county committee did not use full 15 percent as reserve, as was provided in the regulations in order that as much of the acreage would be immediately available for our old growers as was possible. Committee retained only 7-percent reserve rather than the 15 percent allowed in the regulations.

The proposed 70-percent plan would increase our county allotment 69.5 acres. We should possibly explain that our county is a new area, having history on only the years 1946, 1947, and 1948. Our largest year, 1948, shows a planted acreage of 2,214 acres. Our county allotment amounted to 1,517 acres for 41 old cotton farmers. We have had requests from approximately 40 new growers, asking for approximately 3,000 acres new grower allotment. Were it possible that this county could receive 3,000 acres additional, we could keep our cotton growers in business.

Since we are a new area, comparatively speaking, we are definitely left out of any consideration it appears; the result being that cotton farmers will be unable to move in our area and purchase land and plant cotton, which is in so many cases the only crop with which they are familiar.

F. G. COLLIER,
Secretary, Deaf Smith County PMA.

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE,
PRODUCTION AND MARKETING ADMINISTRATION,
Hebbronville, Tex., January 17, 1950.

Hon. LINDLEY BECKWORTH,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Receipt is acknowledged of your letter of January 13, 1950.

The county committee did not reserve the full percent it could reserve. Reason, official allotment granted to county is 1789 acres, which is not sufficient to justify the committee to hold the full percentage. Percent reserved 13.4. The amendment of 70 percent taking into consideration the BAE figures for 1946, 300 acres; 1947, 1,200 acres; and 1948, 1,880 acres. Total for 3 years, 3,380 acres. 70 percent of 3,380 acres, 2,366. Our total county allotment, 1,925.6. This would increase our allotment to 440.4.

If the farmers' reports are used before BAE adjustments we have for 1946, 381 acres; 1947, 1,429 acres; 1948, 2,060 acres, which makes a total of 3,870 acres. 70 percent of this is 2,709 acres. This would give our county 783.4 acres.

We need additional acreages to keep our farmers in business. Most of our farmers received allotments from 5 acres to 20 acres. This is the general rule. We need about 1,000 acres to more or less stabilize our allotments.

Yours very truly,

MANUEL R. RAMIREZ,

DEAR SIR: This is in reply to your letter of January 12, 1950, addressed to the county PMA committee regarding 1950 cotton allotments. I will reply to it for them as their secretary.

Our county committee withheld the full percentage allowed for a reserve to help out in the sore spots. The percentage was 15 percent.

The answer to your question about the additional acreage which the amendment quoted in the copy of the wire would give us in answer fully in my other letter which is enclosed.

Speaking for the county committee, we certainly do need additional cotton acreage to keep genuine cotton farmers and genuine cotton tenants on farm. I would estimate this need at 3,000 more acres.

For the county PMA committee.

Congress of the United States, House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: This is in reply to your letter of January 12, 1950, addressed to me as secretary, county PMA committee, relative to 1950 cotton-acreage allotments.

In reply to your question regarding how much the 70 percent of actual 1946–47–48 cotton-acreage amendment proposed would help our county, I have this to offer. We would be about in the same shape as Houston County if under this amendment we would still be forced to hold down our reported acreages to within the BAE totals for the county. A 70-percent amendment would be of big help to us if in arriving at the average we would be permitted to include war-crop credits. I estimate that the amendment as read in the copy of the wire would only give us about 277 acres more of cotton allotment. An amendment to provide at least an allotment of 50 percent of the highest year, including war-crop credits, would give us 724.6 more acres. A combination of these two amendments would give us 799.1 acres more.

We have a reserve of 103.4 acres set up to take care of farms planting cotton for the first time in 1949 and to new farms. We have had, and will have all together, I estimate, about 75 applications for new allotments out of this reserve.

Yours truly,

DEAR MR. BECKWORTH: This will acknowledge your letters of January 12.

I am not in position to say why the State office set up less than 4 percent when the maximum reserve was 10 percent.

The county office did reserve the full amount of reserve that was set aside for hardship cases, correction of errors and for new growers including old growers that had no cotton and/or war crops in 1946–47 or 48. This being 15 percent.

Judge Roy Selman is correct. Seventy percent of the average reported acreage in 1946–48 would help; however the method used in adjusting to BAE figures would not help. Personally, I'd like to see 70 percent of average reported acreage not to exceed, say 30 or 35 percent of the cropland.

An additional 3,500 acres for hardship cases and new growers—genuine cotton farms that planted no cotton in 1946–47–48 because of abnormal conditions—would help very much.

When this office can be of further assistance, please command.

Representative LINDLEY BECKWORTH,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Thank you for your letters of January 10 and 12 in regard to the cotton allotment situation in Archer County.

Archer County's 1941 cotton acreage was 5,800; the 1950 cotton acreage is 1,377. Reported acreage for 1946 was 1,979, while BAE figures brought it down to 1,050. Reported for 1947, 1,370; BAE, 960. Reported for 1948, 1,368; BAE, 1,200.

Archer County has 109 acres to distribute to all new cotton growers, including those who grew cotton for the first time since the war in 1949. We now have 14 requests on file for new-grower allotments, and the deadline for making applications has been set for March 1.

Yes, Archer County did reserve the full amount that could be reserved.

The amendment giving 70 percent of the 3-year average, during 1946, 1947, and 1948, should add about 105 acres to the Archer County allotment when using BAE figures. However, attempting to explain the BAE cuts to the farmers again might be more trouble than the additional acreage is worth.

SAMUEL B. MARTIN, Secretary,

DEAR MR. BECKWORTH: We have your letter of January 12, 1950, requesting information on the cotton-allotment situation in Brazos County, and we appreciate the opportunity of giving you our views on the subject.

Brazos County has two administrative areas consisting of the bottom land of Brazos River and hill land typical of most of east Texas.

We held only a small reserve for the bottom land as practically all of these farms have been planting each year an acreage large enough to receive their share of the allotment for the area. The situation is entirely different in the hill land. Many farms planted cotton only one of the years, 1946, 1947, 1948, but would receive the same percentage of the cropland as farms planting each of the 3 years. It was obvious that this would cause a reduced factor so the committee reserved 14½ percent of the allotment in this area and distributed this reserve to farms that had been consistently planting cotton.

We have made a tabulation in the county of the proposed 70-percent amendment and find that 93 farms in the county would receive 739.6 acres. This represents approximately 18 percent of the farms receiving allotments. However, most of this acreage will go to farms in the Brazos bottom and we will still be unable to make some needed adjustments on hill farms that should be made.

We are of the opinion that the old release-and-reapportionment clause would be adequate to take care of these needed cases. We have estimated that approximately 1,500 acres would be voluntarily released in the county and this acreage could be used to keep genuine cotton farmers in the business. We suggest that all such released acreage should be handled through county committee reserves and not through transfers from one farm to another.

At any time we can supply you with information relative to this section of the State, please call on us.

Very truly yours,

H. C. SEALE,

DEAR SIR: In reply to your letter of January 13, in regard to the Fayette County cotton allotments for 1950: County committee reserve for Fayette County is 15 percent for all farms. The enclosed 70 percent amendment will not help very many farms in this county.

More acres needed for farmers that planted cotton for the first time in 1949.

DEAR SIR: In reply to your request with reference to 1950 cotton-acreage allotment we wish to advise that Bell County committee reserved approximately 4 percent.

The reason for not holding out more reserve was to keep from lowering the county factor thereby giving regular cotton farms a better percentage of the cotton acreage.

The enclosed amendment would give Bell County farmers about 2,700 additional acres.

We have a number of small farms that this amendment will not help and who should have additional help. This county should have at least 4,000 additional acres.

We have a reserve of 546.3 acres for new growers and we have requests on file now by about 150 farmers.

This county committee will appreciate all the help the Congress can give us.

DEAR REPRESENTATIVE: In regard to your inquiry of January 13 pertaining to cotton allotments in Eastland County, I wish to state that the committee used the full percentage allowed when setting up reserves for adjustments of cotton allotments.

Due to the BAE figures and war-crop credits in this county it is very doubtful if the 70-percent amendment would help us. I believe that 1,000 acres would be sufficient to keep our genuine cotton farmers and tennants on the farm. This acreage would enable them to have enough cotton to furnish them respectable living.

Yours very truly,

DEAR SIR: In reply to your letter of January 13, the county committee set aside 12 percent for reserve in cotton. The maximum amount was 15 percent and the reason the full amount was not set aside was because we had so little acreage to start with that 15 percent was not enough to touch our troubles in high places.

If we were allowed 70 percent of the farms actual cotton acres for 1946, 1947, and 1948, we do not think our county would be hurt. If the BAE figures are used we would be hurt still further. Due to the war-crop credit 500 farms shared in the county allotment that should have been given to 700 regular cotton farms, and we got no additional acres to take care of the war-crop credit farms. Our factor used in the county was .0819 per 100 acres.

DEAR MR. BECKWORTH: In reply to your letter of January 13, 1950, the Jim Wells County Committee reserved 3 percent of the county allotment for new growers and for farms in the 5- to 15-acre group.

The county committee did not see fit to reserve a larger amount and attempt to establish a larger allotment for the genuine cotton farmer or genuine cotton tenant for the following reasons:

(1) The county allotment was very small due to the use of 95 percent of the 1947–48 actual acreage and the 15-percent reserve would not have provided enough acreage to provide enough allotment for all of the genuine cotton men.

(2) Those farmers who had consistently planted war crops had been told that their cotton history and allotment was being protected and preserved under Public Law 12, Seventy-ninth Congress; consequently to reduce the county factor and raise the genuine cotton farmer by means of a 15-percent reserve would have discriminated against the war crop farmer.

Jim Wells County had a cotton allotment of 43,000 acres in 1942; a cotton factor of 37.37 percent. For 1950 our cotton allotment is 20,417 acres; our cotton factor is 0.1425 percent. The situation for our cotton farmer is serious. The economic well-being of the entire Coastal Bend area is threatened.

The proposed 70-percent to 50-percent amendment would add 6,900 acres to our county allotment. To keep genuine cotton farmers and cotton tenants Jim Wells county needs a minimum allotment of 35,000 acres. This could be achieved by crediting the county with war-crop credits and the 70-percent or 50-percent amendment now before the House of Representatives.

The Jim Wells County Committee appreciates your interest in this matter and will be glad to be of further assistance.

DEAR SIR: This will acknowledge receipt of your letter of January 13, 1950, with respect to cotton reserves, etc., of the 1950 cotton-allotment law.

The Hardeman County (Tex.) county committee did not reserve the full percent that they could have reserved. The reason the committee did not withhold the full reserve was that it was their opinion that the reserve was larger than necessary to adjust the hardship cases, etc., and should be issued to the cotton farmers and used rather than be dormant. The amount of reserve the committee withheld was 0.01927 percent for new growers, 0.07544 percent for other farms (which was issued to all farms on percent basis), 0.02659 percent for lates, corrections, and reconstitutions.

The 70-percent law will give this county 997.2 additional acres of cotton if the original cotton-acreage figures as the farmers turned in are used. If the BAE figures are used we will lose 8,958 acres of cotton.

This county received 59,061.7 acres of cotton that was originally issued to cotton producers in 1942. In 1950 this county received 36,192 acres of cotton that was originally issued to cotton producers. The producers having 200 acres of cropland all in cotton received 38.2 acres per 100 acres.

This county does need additional cotton acreage to keep genuine cotton farmers and tenants farming. In the opinion of the county committee this county needs 20,000 acres additional cotton acres.

Trusting this is the desired information, I am,

Yours very truly,

WELDON P. HERMAN,

DEAR SIR: In reply to your letter of January 13, 1950, requesting information concerning cotton allotments in Coryell County, please be advised as follows: The Coryell County committee did not reserve the full percent that could have been reserved; the primary reason the county committee did not reserve the full amount was because they felt that an equitable distribution could not be made to those who had continuously grown cotton through 1946, 1947, and 1948, if a large acreage was reserved. Coryell County reserved approximately 11 percent and could have reserved 15 percent.

The 70-percent amendment will only give this county approximately 2,000 acres more cotton on approximately 1,400 cotton farms, which is a very small amount. We feel that Coryell County needs additional cotton acreage to prevent drastic reductions on farms which are cotton farms and which have been growing cotton during the years of 1946, 1947, and 1948. Our cotton allotment for 1942 was approximately 50,000 acres, and the 1950 acreage allotment is approximately 23,000 acres.

Without running a tabulation, it appears that the proposed 70-percent amendment would help us very little, if the BAE figures are used. The factor for Coryell County was approximately 30 percent in 1942, the present factor is approximately 15 percent. We feel that we could reasonably well satisfy our producers and at the same time accomplish a reasonable reduction in the cotton acreage to comply with the fundamental basis of the cotton program if we were allowed approximately 7,000 additional acres of cotton. With this additional acreage we could bring our factor up to about 20 percent of the tilled acreage.

Yours truly,

N. FOOTE,
Chairman, Coryell County PMA.

DEAR SIR: Listed below is cotton acreage and tilled acreage for Reeves County, Tex., as per accurate tabulations maintained in the county PMA office each year:

	Actual harvested cotton acres	BAE final approved acres	Total tilled acres
1945	5,466.0	5,060	21,014.6
1946	6,153.0	5,800	22,179.2
1947	9,724.0	9,330	23,281.0
1948	30,527.0	30,000	53,996.5
1949	52,521.4		72,630.2
1950			[1] 80,000.0

[1] Estimated.

We received an official cotton allotment of 20,325 acres for the county, of which 18,067 has been distributed to old-farmers. The full 15 percent of the county reserve was held, of which all has been used for corrections, lates, reconstitutions, and old farms which were in cultivation prior to 1948 and some 1948 farms which did not receive an allotment in line with other farms that went into cultivation that year. Of this reserve 448 acres was held to be added to the 1,552 acres received from the State Reserve for new-grower allotments.

We have approximately 21,000 acres of land eligible for new-grower allotments, of which we only have 2,000 acres to distribute among them.

The amendment plan of 70 percent of the past 3-year average would give Reeves County 350 acres more, and the 50-percent plan of 1948 planted acreage would give 1,500 additional acres to the county.

Seventy percent of the 1949 planted cotton acreage (52,521 acres) would be 36,764.7 acres, which would be enough acreage to keep genuine cotton farmers and genuine cotton tenants farming in Reeves County.

HON. LINDLEY BECKWORTH: In reply to your letters of January 10 and 12 concerning the proposed 1950 cotton allotments, the county committee of the Austin County PMA selected every fifth cotton farm in the county and on this basis estimated that the additional cotton acreage needed to set up allotments of 70 percent of the farm actual acreage history in 1946, 1947, and 1948 is 4,360 acres.

We will have approximately 50 new cotton farms in the county and have 174 acres to establish the allotments on these farms.

The county committee reserved 9 percent of the county allotment.

An additional cotton acreage of approximately 3,000 acres is needed to keep genuine cotton farmers and genuine cotton tenants farming.

DEAR MR. BECKWORTH: Under the 50- to 70-percent plan it appears that this county would receive only 1,048 acres more.

In 1942 this county's cotton allotment was 30,746.6 acres with a .3742 factor. At present the allotment is 17,680 acres with a .2388 factor.

We feel that we should at least get as much allotment as the county had in 1942, and even that would not take care of the additional acreage that has been put in since that time. The BAE figures greatly reduce our acreage also.

DEAR MR. BECKWORTH: Henderson County reserved 1,450 acres of its official county allotment, all but 334 acres were used in adjusting 5- to 15-acre and other farms.

The chief concern of the committee is new-grower allotments as you see we only have 334 acres for this purpose, which will only be a drop in the bucket when distributed among 1,000 new growers.

We think you could relieve the situation in east Texas if you could get a price support on dry black-eyed and cream peas. Understand the State of California has one on black-eyed beans, which is the same as our peas.

The county committee concurs with Houston County in that the amendment will not help this county if we have to use the BAE acreage for the county. I am enclosing copy of a letter we sent Tom Pickett.

If we can be of further help, please advise.

From: La Salle County PMA Committee.

We of the county committee are willing only to settle for 70 percent of actual acreage in the highest year of 1946, 1947, 1948, which is 1947, plus 70 percent of war crop credits, which would be 1,797.6 less 1,379 acres 1950 allotment. This would be an additional allotment of 418.6 acres plus 182 acres increase in new grower allotment. This would increase our total to 1,947.6 acres.

HONORABLE BECKWORTH: In reply to your letter dated January 14, 1950, PMA committee did not reserve the full percent; they felt like the total cotton allotment here too small to cut them (the farmers) further. They did reserve approximately 10 percent.

If I understand the Cooley bill, it would give the county some 1,800 additional estimated acres (not enough); BAE figures too low.

County does need additional allotment to keep genuine cotton farmers farming. Failure to give any credit for acreage planted for the first time in 1949 is working severe hardship on many farmers. We have a new irrigated farming district, new homes have been built, pumping equipment installed, and hundreds of acres of cotton planted in 1949 for the first time.

Yoakum County cotton factor 12 percent, adjoining county approximately 30 percent, farms near the line similar to farms in other county percent cropland planted to cotton in the part near the same.

The Honorable LINDLEY BECKWORTH,

DEAR SIR: With reference to your letter of January 13, 1950, in regard to the cotton allotments for Crosby County, Tex., this is to advise that our county committee reserved approximately 10 percent of our county allotment. They did not reserve the full percent since we have very few farms limited by the highest planted acreage, very few new grower cotton farms, and did not anticipate many corrections due to errors.

The amendment you enclosed would give Crosby County approximately 4,254 additional acres. We do not know how much additional cotton acreage the county needs to keep genuine cotton farmers and genuine cotton tenants farming. A number of farmers have remarked that they would have to quit farming, but whether or not they will actually do so is not known. We feel that the proposed amendment whereby no producer shall receive less than 70 percent of his 1946–47–48 average, or 50 percent of his highest planted, whichever is the larger, would be very difficult to administer. BAE estimates were so different from the acreage reported by the farmers that very drastic adjustments by the committee were necessary. These adjustments will be very difficult to justify. We feel that genuine cotton farmers that planted cotton in the 1946–47–48 period and lost their crops before July 1, in one or more of the years, will suffer; also the farmer practicing diversified farming would not receive his full share of the allotment. Our records are unreliable and there is not a possible way of securing reliable acreages. Therefore, we believe that the gain in county acreage would not be worth the problems involved in administering the proposed amendment. As in the past, we believe it would give the biggest liar more than he deserves.

Respectfully yours,

JAMES E. WINTER,
Administrative Officer, Crosby County PMA.

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE,
PRODUCTION AND MARKETING ADMINISTRATION,
Pampa, Tex., January 20, 1950.

The Honorable LINDLEY BECKWORTH,
United States House of Representatives.

DEAR SIR: Regarding your letter of January 13, 1950, our county committee did not reserve the full percentage that it was allowed to reserve because the members felt that as much acreage as possible should be allotted to the regular cotton growers.

The proposed amendment to give the farmers 70 percent of their actual 1946, 1947, 1948 acreage would give our county an additional 655.4 acres.

Gray County does need additional acreage to keep genuine cotton farmers and tenants farming. The majority of cotton farmers feel that the small cotton allotments they received are not large enough for them to realize any profit on their cotton crop and many of these farmers depend entirely on this crop. They feel that a more equal distribution of the allotment among the various counties would probably be more satisfactory.

Very truly yours,

EVELYN J. MASON,
Secretary, Gray County PMA.

Hon. LINDLEY BECKWORTH,

DEAR LINDLEY: The Bowie County Committee failed to hold the full limit of county reserve. About 4 percent was reserved because it was felt that this amount was enough to take away from the producers who had been planting cotton during the period 1946–48. Since the history for that period was so low, it was realized that our county factor would be extremely low even if no county reserve was subtracted from the original county allotment.

This county does need additional allotment for distribution to new farms and to hardship cases. We have estimated that 4,000 acres would be sufficient for this purpose.

Yours very truly,

DEAR SIR: In reply to letter of recent date relative to 70 percent of the farmers' actual cotton acreage in 1946, 1947, and 1948, we submit the following data from Mitchell County, Tex.

Please note BAE acreages which are off bad and would not be fair should a 70-percent amendment be enacted that required their estimates:

Year, 1945:
BAE acreage	70,000
Farmers' acreage	86,657
Year, 1946:
BAE acreage	74,500
Farmers' acreage	98,649
Year, 1947:
BAE acreage	75,800
Farmers' acreage	99,168
Year, 1948:
BAE acreage	81,000
Farmers' acreage	98,881
Average, 1946, 1947, and 1948:
BAE acreage	77,100
Farmers' acreage	98,900
Seventy percent:
BAE acreage	53,970
Farmers' acreage	69,230

Original 1950 county cotton allotment, 67,381.

War crop credits, 1945:
Number of farms	219
Acres	9,173
War crop credits, 1946:
Number of farms	151
Acres	5,102
War crop credits, 1947:
Number of farms	124

You will note we included 1945 merely as a matter of comparative record. We also are sending war crop data relative to Public Law 12 which would increase the acreage credits for 1945, 1946, and 1947.

We regret that BAE county acreage estimates were included in the marketing quota law. For large areas such as States, possibly they are fairly accurate, but when broken down to local units as small as counties, we cannot agree to their accuracy.

Very truly yours,

WILL H. JONES.

Hon. LINDLEY BECKWORTH,
Congressman, Third District, Texas,
Tyler, Tex.

DEAR SIR: The San Jacinto County Committee reserved only 12 percent of the original allotment as they wanted the old cotton farmers to get as near the same percentage of allotted acres as possible.

If the present amendment of 70 percent of the 1946–47–48 average or the 50 percent of the highest planted acres in these years is passed and the BAE figures for these years are used, this county will be in a worse condition than it is now. The committee in adjusting the reported planted acres on the 532c's down to the BAE figures had to actually cut off acres that they knew were planted.

It will take at least 500.0 acres more of cotton in this county for the old cotton farmers and their tenants to continue to stay on their farms. If the acreages are reduced, some landlords and tenants will have to leave the farms with no place to go.

Yours very truly,

JIM P. COUNTS,
Secretary, San Jacinto County PMA.

TEXARKANA CHAMBER OF COMMERCE,

Representative LINDLEY BECKWORTH,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. BECKWORTH: In reply to your letter of January 3, requesting information on how many fewer jobs are in our locality than were here at the height of the war employment, we have now received this information from the employment bureau.

They advised there are about 7,500 fewer people working in this area now than there were during the peak of the employment during the war.

We trust the above answers your inquiry; but if we can be of further service, please do not hesitate to call on us.

Sincerely yours,

L. E. GILLILAND, Manager.

MR. BECKWORTH: Kind friend, with pleasure I ask you for help. I have helped you when you were running for office and will help you again. Now I am asking you for help. My cotton acreage is 10 acres and I ask for 15. Will you please help me get more cotton acreage. If I don't get more than 10 acres, I will have to have help. My land is poor and I can't make much on 10 acres of cotton, so please help me get this acreage up to 15 acres if you can. I hope you will do all you can for me. You know things we have to buy are high; and if we have no money, we can't buy—and we all feel good when we have money to pay our bills.

Hoping to hear from you and hoping you will help me—and if you run for office I will still have you in mind.

Yours truly, and by-by,

ED WEST.

Hon. LINDLEY BECKWORTH,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. BECKWORTH: This will reply to your letter of December 30 in which you requested my opinion on whether Texas needs additional cotton-acreage allotment or a redistribution of the available allotment, or a combination of these two provisions.

At the time the State committee reviewed and adjusted computed county allotments, it was our feeling that the allotment that each county committee was notified of was adequate in view of the acreage of cotton that had been planted in recent years. However, the method of distribution of the county allotment to farms required that the county allotment be apportioned not only to farms on which cotton had been planted in 1946, 1947, or 1948, but also to farms on which no cotton had been planted in one or more of these 3 years but on which designated cotton war crops were produced instead of cotton in 1946 and/or 1947. On the basis of experience during the 1938–42 cotton-allotment programs, and from information received from various county committees, we feel that from 10 to 20 percent of the 1950 cotton allotments will not be planted in the East Texas area. Many county committees have expressed to me the opinion that the total county allotment is sufficient for establishing fair and equitable allotments for all genuine cotton farms in the county but under the provisions of law they are, of course, prevented from doing so.

Consequently, a release and reapportionment provision similar to that used under other programs will help some in the proper distribution of 1950 cotton allotments. Also, some provision should be written that will establish a floor under the 1950 farm-cotton allotments. Probably the 70–50 plan would be satisfactory. However, in the long pull, it is my opinion that Public Law 272 passed by the Eighty-first Congress in August of last year must be rewritten to give county and community committeemen considerably greater latitude in making farm-cotton allotments. We are currently operating allotment programs for wheat, peanuts, and potatoes in Texas with considerable success and with very little complaint from farmers affected. It is my feeling that in most Texas counties farm-cotton allotments should be made on a plan similar to that for making peanut, wheat, and potato allotments. Nevertheless, there are many blackland and West Texas counties in which the cropland percentage approach to farm-cotton allotments is satisfactory and need not be disturbed.

Very truly yours,

B. F. VANCE,
Chairman, State Committee.

COLLEGE STATION, TEX., December 8, 1949.
Hon. LINDLEY BECKWORTH,
United States Representative,
Gladewater, Tex.

DEAR MR. BECKWORTH: This will reply to your letter of December 5 in which you requested detailed statistical information on the 1950 cotton allotment for Panola County.

We have developed these data for the county in three parts and have shown comparable data for Dawson County, as follows:

TABLE I

County	1947 acres	1948 acres	1947–48 average	1950 total allotment	Percent allotment is of average
Dawson	266,000	270,000	268,000	228,755	85
Panola	14,600	17,300	15,950	17,367	109

TABLE II

County	1946 acres	1947 acres	1948 acres	1946–48 average	Percent average is of allotment
Dawson	127,765	267,591	270,000	221,785	103

TABLE III

County	Cropland	1947–48 average acreage	1950 total allotment	Percent average acreage of cropland	Percent allotment of cropland
Dawson	408,000	268,000	228,755	65.7	56.1

In the first table the 1947 and 1948 actual acreages of cotton are given and are compared with the 1950 total county allotment. All Texas county allotments were computed on the basis of 95 percent of the 1947–48 average acreage, with adjustments for trends, abnormal conditions, for small farms, and for new farms. The Panola County allotment was adjusted for abnormal conditions in the amount of 2,357 acres and for small farms in the amount of approximately 1,300 acres.

Many contend that if cotton war-crop credits (acreage of designated cotton war crops that was grown instead of cotton in 1945, 1946, and 1947) had been given in the apportionment of the national allotment to States and the State allotment to counties, some counties would have received better allotments. Table II illustrates the relationships between the allotment and 1946, 1947, and 1948 county acreages plus war-crop credits.

Table III is designed to show that about two-thirds of the cropland in Dawson County was devoted to cotton in the years 1947 and 1948 as compared to less than 15 percent in Panola County. The cropland factor for Dawson County is .5600 and for Panola is .1398.

As is shown in table I, all county cotton allotments are required to be computed on the basis of 95 percent of the 1947–48 average acreage. However, the county allotment is required to be apportioned not only to farms on which cotton was planted in one or more of the years 1946, 1947, or 1948, but also to other farms on which designated cotton war crops were produced instead of cotton in 1946 or 1947. This apparent inadequacy of the law has led to much of the dissatisfaction arising from 1950 allotments in a rather large number of our counties. Congressman BOB POAGE contends that the solicitor's office has incorrectly interpreted the intent of the Congress in a determination of county allotments, while on the other hand the solicitor has ruled that as the law is written it is impossible to compute county allotments on the basis of planted acreage and cotton war-crop credits if the State allotment is computed on the basis of planted acreage only.

Very truly yours,

B. F. VANCE,
Chairman, State Committee.

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE,
College Station, Tex., December 16, 1949.
Hon. LINDLEY BECKWORTH,
United States Representative,
Gladewater, Tex.

DEAR MR. BECKWORTH: This will reply to your letter of December 12 with which you returned my letter of December 8 and requested that additional information be shown for Dawson and Panola Counties.

These data are as follows:

County	1942 cropland	1950 cropland	1942 allotment	1950 allotment	Percent 1950 allotment is of 1942 allotment
Dawson	277,500	408,000	126,188	228,755	181
Panola	152,900	109,300	52,883	17,367	33

Any comparison of the 1950 county cotton allotment with the 1942 county cotton allotment should be made on the basis that the 1950 county cotton allotments were computed, using only 1947 and 1948 cotton acreages, whereas 1942 cotton allotments reflect in part the acreage of cotton produced in each county during the years 1928–32 and in part numerous gadgets included in the old law that provided for minimum county allotments and minimum farm allotments. It is also correct to point out that the acreage of cotton has been steadily increasing in west Texas counties and has been steadily decreasing in east Texas counties for the last 15 years. It is my opinion that the cost of production of cotton in east Texas is too high as compared with the cost of production in west Texas so as to result in farmers in both areas being on a competitive basis. East Texas farmers could probably make more money by taking up some livestock or poultry enterprises along with the production of feed and food crops that are locally adapted and can be used where produced.

Very truly yours,

B. F. VANCE,
Chairman, State Committee.

UNITED STATES DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE,
College Station, Tex., December 28, 1949.
Hon. LINDLEY BECKWORTH,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. BECKWORTH: This will reply to your letter of December 23 in which you have raised two questions as to how the cotton allotment and marketing quota program will affect cotton farmers.

Section 344 (f) of the AAA Act of 1938, as amended, provides that "the county acreage allotment less not to exceed the percentage provided for in paragraph 3 of this subsection shall be apportioned to farms on which cotton has been planted (or regarded as having been planted) in any one of the 3 years immediately preceding the year for which such allotment is determined."

As we understand this provision, 1950 cotton allotments are determined for farms and not for farmers. Also, for 1950 the allotment is based on the history of the farm during the years 1946, 1947, and 1948, as well as the amount of cropland in the farm. Conceivably then, there might be genuine cotton farmers who will operate farms in 1950 for which allotments cannot be established under the provisions of the law. Even in these few cases, it is possible for county committees to establish group II or new farm allotments to the extent that the county reserve acreage set aside for this purpose will permit.

It is my opinion that very few, if any, genuine cotton farmers will be denied the privilege of growing some cotton during the 1950 crop year.

Very truly yours,

B. F. VANCE,
Chairman, State Committee.

Mr. Speaker, I submit some additional information:

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE,
Washington, D. C., November 16, 1949.

Hon. LINDLEY BECKWORTH,
House of Representatives.

DEAR MR. BECKWORTH: This is in reply to your two letters of October 18, 1949, with respect to methods of supporting fruits and vegetables.

There is enclosed a copy of Miscellaneous Publication 683, Price Programs of the United States Department of Agriculture, 1949. This publication will provide you with much of the detailed information in which you are interested.

Price-support operation for fruits and vegetables are limited to dry beans and peas, potatoes and sweetpotatoes. Assistance is provided growers of other fruits and vegetables by means of surplus-removal purchase operations as needs arise, depending upon the funds and outlets available to the Department and other considerations.

Dry beans of specified classes, including baby lima and pinto, are supported, since they were Steagall commodities. Dry whole peas are similarly supported, but black-eyes are not supported. In our normal classification we consider black-eyes as beans rather than as peas. Black-eyes are not supported because the Department did not ask for increased production of this class during the war, since outlets outside of the United States were practically nonexistent.

Support of the 1949 crops of dry beans is at 80 percent of parity, and the support on dry peas is at 60 percent. In each program the support is given by means of loans and purchase agreements available to producers. On dry peas the Department supports the price of the commodity as it comes from the thresher; whereas on dry beans the support is on a cleaned-and-graded basis, which service is normally done by local warehousemen. The reason for the distinction is that excess peas which might be acquired under the price-support program could very well have only a feed outlet. For feed purposes the amount by which the value of cleaned peas would exceed that of thresher-run peas would be insufficient to cover the cost of cleaning.

Copies of the press releases and the program regulations for the 1949 support programs on dry beans and peas are enclosed.

In the case of vegetables other than potatoes and sweetpotatoes for fresh-market sales, price support is not mandatory. Our operations are limited by available funds and outlets and the perishable nature of the commodity. These commodities are grown commercially in nearly all of the States. The period between planting and harvesting is short for most of these vegetables. Areas planted vary from a fraction of an acre to large-scale operations. Double and even triple cropping is not unusual. Marketing seasons between areas are finely drawn and frequently overlap because of variable weather conditions. Prices during a market season vary widely, frequently from very high to very low levels. Consequently, we do not announce in advance support-price levels. To do so would tend to encourage acreage expansion and we have no practical means of acreage allotments. We are compelled to confine our operations to surplus-removal programs as market gluts arise and to a few important commodities for which outlets to school lunch and other eligible institutions are available. The thinking behind this type of program simply is that by removing the spot surpluses, market prices will improve sufficiently to be of benefit to the grower. Our maximum purchase prices for these operations are based on 75 percent of the individual commodity parity prices.

Mandatory price support for potatoes has been in effect since in 1943, first as a Steagall crop, and presently under the Agricultural Act of 1948. The principal support method is by purchases, particularly in connection with the early crop but loans have been an important supplement in the late-producing areas where large quantities are stored and where markets frequently are depressed as a result of growers' needs for cash at harvest time. Price-support announcements for the ensuing crop season usually are made in the late fall or winter. They contain an outline of the basic plan, including conditions of eligibility. Beginning in 1947, only growers planting within their individual farm potato acreage allotments have been permitted to participate.

Under prewar conditions, it was assumed that for all consumption purposes, production of about 360 to 370 million bushels was needed. More recently 350,000,000 bushels has been the production goal, but there is some evidence that even this figure is too high and that with normal quality a supply as low as 335,000,000 bushels would be adequate. On a per capita basis, annual consumption has been declining steadily for over half a century at a rate close to 1 percent per year. More recently the rate of decline has been accelerated, and 1948 consumption is estimated at 108 pounds per capita compared with averages of 182 pounds for the 1909–13 period and 131 pounds for the 1935–39 period. As to crop disposition, data for the 1944–48 period show an average of 79 percent of the potato crop sold for food and seed, the balance being consumed as food and seed on the farms where grown, and wasted or fed to livestock. It should be observed, however, that the percentage sold includes sales to the Department under price-support programs.

Price support of sweetpotatoes is mandatory through December 31, 1949, because it is a Steagall commodity. The current crop will be supported in accordance with the Agricultural Act of 1948 at prices which will return growers not less than 60 percent or more than 90 percent of parity at the beginning of the marketing season (July 1, 1949). Beginning January 1, 1950, sweetpotatoes will be in the same category as other vegetables on which price support is optional. However, since December 31 is about the middle of the sweetpotato marketing season and a basic change in support was undesirable in the middle of the season, the Department committed itself to support the 1949 crop of sweetpotatoes at an average of 80 percent of the July 1, 1949, parity. A press release giving the schedule of prices and details of the 1949 sweetpotato price-support program is enclosed.

During the 5-year period (1943–47) the Bureau of Agricultural Economics estimates that approximately 43 percent of the total production of sweetpotatoes was sold. They estimate that about 32 percent was used in the farm household. The remainder was used for seed, fed to livestock, and lost through waste after harvest. The 1949 production is estimated at 51,900,000 bushels. On the basis of these averages it is estimated that about 22,300,000 bushels would be sold and the farm household would consume 16,600,000 bushels.

The Department has no price-support program for figs. It has announced a program under which diversion payments of 3 cents a pound will be made on up to 1,000 tons of Black Mission figs. These figs are being contributed voluntarily by producers to a surplus pool for disposition outside of normal trade channels.

Surplus removal programs have been undertaken for a number of deciduous fruits during the 1949 season. Fresh pears, apples, and prunes were purchased during August and September. Purchases of each of these fresh fruits were undertaken in an endeavor to improve market conditions then prevailing for these fruits. Purchases of these commodities were distributed under the school-lunch program and to eligible agencies and institutions and the rate of purchase was governed by the capacity of the outlets to utilize the fruit.

A total of 1,093 cars of Bartlett pears was purchased in California, Oregon, and Washington during the period August 2 through September 20, 1949. Purchases were made at the price of $2.15 per box f. o. b. shipping point. At the start of the program the purchase price was measurably above the then prevailing commercial market price, whereas at the termination of purchases the commercial market price had improved and, in fact, increased to a level above the purchase price.

There were 135 cars of Gravenstein apples purchased in California during the period August 2 through August 21, 1949, at $1.90 per box f. o. b. The California Gravenstein apple industry during the 1949 season adopted a series of rigorous marketing controls designed to improve prices to producers, and the purchases under this program were adapted to the marketing-control pattern established by the industry.

There were 75 cars of Italian prunes purchased in Idaho during the first 2 weeks in September. The purchases of this commodity were made at a price of $1.10 per one-half bushel basket f. o. b. shipping point.

In an endeavor to assist growers of peaches in the United States to market relatively abundant supplies of freestone peaches in the late producing States and of clingstone peaches grown on the Pacific coast, there were 937,210 cases of canned peaches purchased for distribution under the school-lunch program. Purchases of this commodity were made on an offer-and-acceptance basis, and the average price paid for all canned peaches was $4.06 per case delivered to destinations.

Purchases of fresh apples for distribution under the school-lunch program and to eligible agencies and institutions currently are being made by the Department. The purchase price at the present time is $1.70 per box or bushel, f. o. b. shipping point for specified varieties and sizes of fruit. Only U. S. No. 1 apples are being purchased, and the rate of purchase is geared to the capacity of the available outlets to utilize fresh apples. Purchases under this program were started during the week beginning October 10 and authorizations have been issued for purchases of over 2,000 cars during the first 6 weeks of operation of the program. Purchases are being made in 28 States and allocations to each State are based on the proportionate share of the total United States commercial production contributed by that State.

In an endeavor to assist the United States apple and winter-pear industries to regain their export outlets, the Department has issued an export-payment program under which is subsidy of 50 percent of the f. a. s. price, but not more than $1.25 per box or per bushel, is made to exporters for apples or winter pears destined to the Economic Cooperation Administration and Western Hemisphere countries with the exception of Canada, Mexico, Cuba, and Venezuela. The eligible countries are those whose purchasing of United States apples and winter pears have been curtailed as a result of a shortage of dollar exchange. Copies of the announcements indicating the terms and conditions of these programs are enclosed.

Citrus fruits have been purchased in periods of surplus during the last few seasons to the extent that funds and outlets were available. These purchases were made under surplus-removal programs rather than price-support programs. Substantial purchases were made during the 1947–48 season when prices to growers were very low. Purchases during that fiscal year were equivalent to approximately 5,500,000 boxes of grapefruit and 3,300,000 boxes of oranges.

Prior to the severe freezes which occurred in the citrus-fruit-producing areas of Texas, California, and Arizona last winter the Department has instituted a purchase program for concentrated orange juice and a quantity of this product equivalent to about 1,250,000 boxes was acquired for use in school lunches. Purchase programs for citrus fruit were discontinued last season after these freezes since prices advanced materially. The Texas freeze resulted in very large losses of both fruit and trees in the Rio Grande Valley. As a result, a disaster area was designated and the Farmers Home Administration has made loans available to growers for rehabilitating and replanting groves. In addition to the purchase program during the 1948–49 season an export subsidy program was issued for citrus fruits. Under this program approximately 750,000 boxes (fresh equivalent) of oranges and grapefruit were exported to the Marshall-plan countries.

We are now giving consideration to the marketing situation for the 1949–50 citrus-fruit crop, the harvesting of which has just started. A large crop of oranges is expected but the grapefruit crop will be drastically reduced as a result of the freezes last winter. Texas grapefruit growers whose groves were not seriously damaged by the freeze should have a profitable season in 1949–50.

Sincerely yours,

A. J. LOVELAND,
Under Secretary.

COTTON PROGRAM

To the News:

I have read with interest the comment in your paper with reference to the 1950 Government cotton program. It seems strange that a mathematical problem so simple could be so fogged.

If the Government actually wants to cut the cotton acreage 23 percent—or any other percent—all that is necessary is to permit a cotton farmer to plant no more than 77 percent of his 1949 cotton acreage in cotton during the year 1950 and not permit any farmer to plant cotton in 1950 unless he planted cotton in 1949. In this way each cotton farmer would bear his just pro rata part of the reduction. Any other method is designed to give one group of farmers an advantage over others and to favor some particular section of the country.

Of course, a 23-percent cut in acreage does not mean a 23-percent cut in production. This acreage cut can easily be overcome by planting the best land in cotton, the use of fertilizer, insect control, and more intensive cultivation methods. The only sure way to reduce the cotton crop is to limit the amount of cotton which can be marketed. The proper method is to let supply, demand, and price, control the crop. This method, of course, is not designed to create jobs for political employees.

NEIL THOMASON.

Hon. LINDLEY BECKWORTH,
House of Representatives.

DEAR MR. BECKWORTH: This is in reply to your letter of December 5 in which you ask for the definition of various types of farmers.

Generally speaking, an individual could be identified as several kinds of farmer depending on his experience and the products he was producing; that is, one man could be a cotton farmer, peanut farmer, rice farmer, and dairy farmer. If you refer to his eligibility for allotments or quotas the requirements are listed in the Agricultural Adjustment Act of 1938, as amended. A copy of a compilation is enclosed.

We believe our PMA committeemen and other employees who might be called upon to make a decision can make the proper identification of the various types of farmers.

Sincerely,

A. J. LOVELAND,
Under Secretary.

DEAR LINDLEY: I am writing in regard to the cotton acreage. I think it is working a hardship on myself as well as the other farmers. I own a farm of 110 acres and am allowed only 10 acres in cotton. If there is anything you could do in regard to getting the cotton acreage raised it would sure help many farmers in this county.

DEAR SECRETARY BRANNAN: I quote the pertinent part of a letter I have received from Mr. O. H. Moseley, route No. 1, Ben Wheeler, Tex.:

"I am near 70 years old and have planted cotton as a principal crop most of my life. I have been too old and crippled to work and plant anything the past few years. During the war and some years since neither labor nor tenants were obtainable. During that period I raised a few cattle. Not many. I am too crippled to do that now, and I am not permitted to vote in the cotton program nor allowed any acreage for 1950 in order to induce either labor or tenant to work my farm for 1950. I can see no fairness in such edict even if I were an ardent believer in all Government programs, and feeling the way I do about such programs, it is a bitter pill to swallow, I can tell you.

"I am an old man and haven't much longer to remain in this world, and it will make little difference to me personally if the farms are confiscated by Government, but it hurts me to think that my children and grandchildren are to receive such inheritance."

I will welcome any suggestions you may have. Mr. Moseley will appreciate any help you can give him.

Sincerely,

LINDLEY BECKWORTH,
Member of Congress.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN LINDLEY BECKWORTH: We are poor farmers. We work hard doing war work in the war and bought us a little farm of 50 acres and just as we got our house built my husband had a break-down and was sick for 4 years, and try to farm last year the first time since we bought the land. I had to go to the hospital on July 17 and that bill was $614. The insects eat our cotton and we only got five bales, so that did not near pay us out, and this year they don't want to let us plant any cotton, and the land is too poor to raise any feed on, and my husband is not able to get a job since he is too old, and there are no jobs this way anyway. I pray, if you can do anything to help us, only get 10 acres. We may could get by somehow. With him sick like he is it about to run him crazy for we don't want to have to sell the place and nowhere to go.

Yours truly,

DEAR MR. BECKWORTH: This will reply to your letter of January 3 with which you enclosed a letter from Mr. Zan R. May, Joaquin, Tex.

It seems that Mr. May has filed an application for review of his 1950 cotton-acreage allotment and marketing quota with the Panola County committee. We have no way of knowing how much increase, if any, the review committee will grant Mr. May at the time his hearing is conducted. The review committee will be governed by the same regulations and instructions in considering appeals as State and county committees were required to follow in establishing original farm allotments.

We expect to conduct review-committee hearings in east Texas counties during February and early March.

Very truly yours,

B. F. VANCE,
Chairman, State Production and Marketing Administration Committee.

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE,
Washington, January 20, 1950.

Hon. LINDLEY BECKWORTH,
Member of Congress,
House Office Building,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. BECKWORTH: I am replying to your letter of December 19, 1949, in which you asked if the situation reported for Arkansas by Mr. R. L. Compere, the State director of the Selective Service System, was accurate over the United States. Mr. Compere reported that the areas of Arkansas where the soil was least productive sent a higher percentage of its farmers to work in war plants.

As you know, the loss of people from farms during World War II was, in part, to the armed services. Numerically, the much greater out-flow was of farm people who moved to nonfarm areas and took nonfarm jobs. Statistics are not available to provide a break-down between those who took jobs in war plants and those who found employment at other types of nonfarm jobs.

With respect to the inductions of men directly from farms into the armed forces, the deferment policies followed under the Tydings amendment were administered for a part of the war period on the basis of the war unit criteria with respect to size of farm. This operated in the direction of more deferment of farm workers of military age on the more productive and larger-size farms. Conversely males of military age on inadequate-sized farms failed to meet the deferment criteria in greater proportions. There were probably many instances when the implementation of this policy was less than perfect, but in general, the Selective Service System did get relatively more men from smaller and less productive farms than from the larger or more productive farms.

With regard to the civilian net out-migration from farms during the war years, the information is much less direct as to the type and size of farms from which the workers left. The available evidence suggests that, by and large, out-migration from farms occurred at somewhat heavier rates in regions and areas where the proportion of the farm population living on small, marginal, or subsistence types of farming units was great; that is, from areas in which population pressure was greatest.

As data that may be relevant to your general problem, I am enclosing estimates of the changes in the farm population by States during the 5 years preceding January 1945. These figures cover persons of all ages and both sexes, but the decrease in the total farm population during World War II gives some idea of the relative impact of the war on the agricultural manpower situation in the different parts of the country. Arkansas and the three other States of the West South Central had sharper rates of decrease in the farm population than were experienced anywhere else in the United States.

The losses in farm population shown in the attached table for the war period have, in part, been recouped since the end of the war. For the United States as a whole, the farm population at the beginning of 1949 was 27,776,000 compared with 25,190,000 in January 1945.

Sincerely yours,

K. T. HUTCHINSON,
Assistant Secretary.

Estimates by the Bureau of Agricultural Economics.

HALLETTSVILLE, TEX., January 14, 1950.

Hon. LINDLEY BECKWORTH,
Gladewater, Tex.

DEAR SIR: We note through the papers that the peanut acreage for 1950 has been greatly reduced again; this is going to work an awful hardship on the small peanut grower, due to the fact that the cut last year in this county cut quite a few of the growers to such small acreage.

We think that it should be so provided that there be a small minimum number of acres, per farm possibly 6 or 7 acres, and also in each county where the allowable peanut acreage to the farmer is so small that he does not use the allotment, it could be transferable to other farm or grower that was planting his small allotment.

We think such a policy would keep many little peanut growers carrying this as one of their projects to help them make their living and have a balanced all-around farm income for the whole year.

We believe that this provision should be written into the law and to insure its passage, we think petitions should be addressed to the Congressman of each district by the growers located therein.

We submit this for your consideration.

Yours truly,

O. B. SOKOL.

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE,

Hon. LINDLEY BECKWORTH,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. BECKWORTH: The Cotton Branch of Production and Marketing Administration has referred to this office a letter dated December 15, 1949, to you from Mr. W. I. Crew and wife of Route 2, Grand Saline, Tex. We received a copy of this same letter in December and replied on December 22, 1949. Mr. Crew had requested your assistance in securing a 1950 cotton allotment for his farm.

According to available information, the farm had no cotton history in 1946, 1947, or 1948. Consequently, under existing legislation, it was not possible to establish a group I or regular cotton allotment during November or December of last year. The farm is probably eligible for a group II or new farm allotment, and therefore Mr. Crew should contact his county PMA committee soon and apply to them for a group II allotment. It is probable that such an allotment can be established before March 1, at which time he will be advised by the Wood County committee.

Very truly yours,

B. F. VANCE,
Chairman, State Committee.

DEAR LINDLEY: Am returning the material you sent me.

Thanks a lot for your help. One of my families are going to move. My gin customers are coming to me every day from around Big Sandy and Gladewater telling me they are out of the farming business if something isn't done. I have a $20,000 gin at Starrville that would like to let the United States Government have for $4,000 as I won't need it any more.

Your friend,

OLIN WEAVER.

Hon. LINDLEY BECKWORTH,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. BECKWORTH: This will reply to your letters of January 4 and 11 with which you enclosed copies of letters dated December 30 and January 5 from Mr. J. O. McCreight, of Yantis, Tex. Mr. McCreight had requested your assistance in securing larger cotton allotments for Wood County farms.

As stated in previous letters, amendatory legislation now being considered by the Congress will, no doubt, help 1950 farm cotton allotments in nearly all east Texas counties. However, it is my opinion that existing cotton legislation should be completely rewritten for the 1951 crop year to provide for the making of farm cotton allotments in diversified counties on the basis of average farm cotton history rather than on the basis of a percentage of cropland in such farms. This method of making allotments is being used successfully in peanut, wheat, and potato programs in this State. It was the method that Department of Agriculture spokesmen recommended to the first session of the Eighty-first Congress. I believe that it will correct nearly all of the inequities that have occurred in making 1950 farm cotton allotments in the specified counties.

Very truly yours,

B. F. VANCE,
Chairman, State Committee.

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE,
PRODUCTION AND MARKETING ADMINISTRATION,
College Station, Tex., January 19, 1950.

Hon. LINDLEY BECKWORTH,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. BECKWORTH: This will reply to your letters of December 29, 30, 31, 1949, and January 7, 9, 11, 1950, in which you enclosed copies of letters from the following:

Mr. Oather Yarbrough, route 4, Wills Point, Tex.

Mr. Henry A. Godwin, Grand Saline, Tex.

Mr. W. H. Hopson, route 3, Ben Wheeler, Tex.

Mr. S. C. Huff, route 1, Ben Wheeler, Tex.

Mr. Arlie E. Hollowell, route 3, Grand Saline, Tex.
Mr. E. J. Hale, route 3, Grand Saline, Tex.
Mr. F. P. Boulter.
Mr. J. R. Hanson, route 7, box 53, Tyler, Tex.
Mr. Monroe Arnold, route 3, box 323, Tyler, Tex.
Mr. C. C. Garrett, route 1, box 70, Tyler, Tex.
Mr. W. L. Pettigrew, Grand Saline, Tex.

In each instance the writer had requested your assistance in securing a 1950 cotton acreage allotment for his farm.

As we understand the 11 letters, it was not possible for the State and county committees to establish group I or regular cotton allotments because there was no cotton history during one or more of the years 1946, 1947, or 1948. Therefore the farmer should contact his local county PMA committee soon and file an application for a new grower or Group II cotton allotment for 1950. Each county committee has reserved a small portion of the total county allotment for use in establishing allotments for farms on which there was no cotton history during the 3 years mentioned above. In all probability, new grower cotton allotments can be established by March 1, after which farmers who have applied will be notified.

Very truly yours,

B. F. VANCE,
Chairman, State Committee.

PINE GROVE FARM,
Ben Wheeler, Tex., January 21, 1950.

DEAR MR. BECKWORTH: My tenant had 5 acres of cotton last year—1948—which was the only cotton raised on my farm in several years. As the law now stands, if I get any cotton acreage it will have to come out of the new grower's allotment which will be but an acre or so, maybe none.

This is not fair. It seems to me that those who have not had the profit of raising cotton the last several years should be given a chance now and besides, during the war my farm produced war crop. If you can, please advise James Hodge, secretary ACA, Canton, to give me at least 6 acres.

B. E. YOUNGBLOOD.

Mr. Speaker, incidentally, I wired Mr. B. F. Vance as to whether or not he had made a survey of Texas to determine how many genuine cotton farmers might be compelled to quit growing cotton in 1950. I enclose his answer to my wire.

Greenwood County needs 3,000 additional cotton acreage to keep genuine cotton farmers and cotton tenants farming. Proposed amendment would help if farmers actual-planted acreage used. If adjusted acreage figures used, amendment would be worthless.

DEAR MR. BECKWORTH: In answer to your letter of January 16, 1950, we wish to advise that we held out the full amount the law allowed for cotton adjustments which was 15 percent of the county allocation.

It is very doubtful if the 70-percent amendment would benefit any of our farmers.

We need 2,000 acres to make the necessary adjustments. We believe if the release-and-reapportionment law can be effected these adjustments can be made from the farms of farmers who have allotments but who will not plant any cotton.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN BECKWORTH: Reference is made to your letter of January 13.

The Florida State PMA Committee set aside as a reserve the full 10 percent of the State allotment permitted by law. We requested every county committee in cotton counties to set aside the full 15 percent permitted by law. Everyone of the committees, without exception, did so.

In 14 counties out of the 20 cotton counties of the State of Florida all of the county committee's 15 percent plus all that could be spared from the State reserve was required to meet the mandatory small-farm provision. Six counties had a very small acreage (12 to 457) left for adjustments to larger farms after meeting the small-farm minimum. After supplementing county reserves that were inadequate for this purpose, we have 362 acres left in the State reserve for new farms. We estimate that there will be approximately 1,000 new farm applications.

Our total State allotment is 41,570 acres of which 11,374 acres (in addition to their computed allotment) was required to meet the mandatory small-farm provisions.

The cropland factor approach was also a source of many inequitable allotments for the larger farms and you can readily see from the above that neither the State nor the county committees had no possible way to remedy the situation.

Yours very truly,

R. S. DENNIS,
Executive Officer.

DEAR SIR: Mr. H. G. Clayton, director, agricultural extension service, University of Florida, has requested that we furnish you a record by counties of the additional acreage required to give eligible old grower cotton farms in Florida:

1. Fifty percent of the highest cotton acreage in the years 1946–1948 (highest acreage to include war-crop or veterans credit).
2. Seventy percent of the average acreage of cotton grown in the years 1946–1948 (war-crop credit excluded).
3. Larger of item 1 or 2.

These estimates were recently compiled and a record of such estimates is attached.

Please note that our estimate for the 70-percent provision referred to in item 2 above does not include war-crop credit. No estimate has been compiled on that basis under the 70-percent proviso.

Yours very truly,

R. S. DENNIS,
Executive Officer.

LIVINGSTON, ALA., January 18, 1950.

Hon. LINDLEY BECKWORTH,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: The county committee of Sumter County held out only a small number of acres—not 1 percent—using the BAE figures cut our acreage so drastically that nothing seemed to help.

The proposed 70 percent of actual planted acreage in 1946–48 would satisfy our farmers. As the status now is many tenant farmers will have to move and find work at something they have never done before.

While the farmers believe some control is necessary, they do not think the drastic cut imposed is necessary.

Sincerely yours,

H. V. HUDSON,
Chairman, County Committee,
Sumter County.

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE,
PRODUCTION AND MARKETING ADMINISTRATION,
Baton Rouge, La., January 17, 1950.

Hon. LINDLEY BECKWORTH,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. BECKWORTH: This will acknowledge your letters date January 3 and

January 10 requesting the following information:

1. 1942 county cotton acreage allotments;

2. Acreage planted to cotton by counties in the years 1947 and 1948;

3. The 1950 cotton acreage allotments for counties; and

4. The additional acreage that would be needed to give each cotton farm a 1950 allotment equal to the larger of 70 percent of the average acreage planted to cotton on the farm in the years 1946, 1947, 1948 or 50 percent of the highest acreage planted to cotton including credit for war crops in any one of the above noted 3 years.

The enclosure contains the information requested. The acreages planted to cotton for the years 1947–48 represent BAE estimates. The additional acreage required to raise each farm's allotment to the 70–50 provision is an estimate based on a 20-percent sample.

If there is any further information that you need, please advise us.

Sincerely yours,

L. A. MULLIN,
Chairman, State PMA Committee.

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE,
PRODUCTION AND MARKETING ADMINISTRATION,
Natchitoches, La., January 16, 1950.

Hon. LINDLEY BECKWORTH,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. BECKWORTH: In reply to your letter of January 12, 1950, this is to advise that the Natchitoches Parish PMA Committee held a 9-percent reserve for adjustments. A 15-percent reserve could have been held.

The committee did not hold the full 15-percent reserve because they realized that it would be difficult to make an equitable distribution before allotment notices, showing the computed acreages, were mailed to the farmers.

It is believed that a much better job of distribution could have been made of the reserve that was held if we could have mailed the farmers a notice of the computed allotment and then have allocated the reserve at a later date. In this way, we would have been able to help some of the hardship cases that came to our attention later.

As to the enclosed amendment, if the 70-percent minimum were based on BAE figures, we would get about 1,365 acres; however, in many cases, the reported figures were reduced below the actual average in order to come within BAE figures.

We could take care of most of our hardship cases with 3,000 additional acres.

A frozen-acreage provision would help the situation here quite a lot. If we could pick up unused acreage from now until April 30, 1950, we could get enough acreage to help many of our hardship cases.

Yours very truly,

H. L. SISSON,
Parish Administrative Officer.

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE,
PRODUCTION AND MARKETING ADMINISTRATION,
Jonesboro, La., January 20, 1950.

Mr. LINDLEY BECKWORTH,
Member of Congress, House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. BECKWORTH: This is in reply to your letter of January 16, 1950, concerning 1950 cotton-acreage allotments.

Before our committee obtained a factor to apply against the cropland of each cotton farm we reserved the full 15 percent allowed us to reserve. The suggested amendment enclosed with your letter would give us about 50 additional acres.

Our parish needs about 100 acres of additional acreage to keep genuine cotton farmers and genuine cotton tenants farming.

Sincerely yours,

JAMES F. DAVIS,
Secretary, Jackson Parish PMA Committee.

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE,
PRODUCTION AND MARKETING ADMINISTRATION,
Decatur, Ill., January 18, 1950.

Congressman LINDLEY BECKWORTH,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN BECKWORTH: Reference is made to your letter of December 13, 1949, which was addressed to Springfield, Ill., and consequently was delayed in reaching this office.

Originally the State committee reserved the full 10 percent in setting up cotton-acreage allotments. Each of the two counties reserved a full 15 percent. However, in order to comply with the 5-acre minimum requirement, we found it necessary to use the 15-percent reserve in each county and also all of the State's 10-percent reserve except 70 acres in one county and 90 acres in the other. This small reserve was held for appeals and corrections.

Very truly yours,

HARRY M. COMBRINK,
Acting Chairman, Illinois PMA Committee.

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE,
AGRICULTURAL ADJUSTMENT ADMINISTRATION,
Forsyth, Ga., January 23, 1950.

Mr. LINDLEY BECKWORTH,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: In answer to your inquiry dated January 16, 1950, the following is submitted:

1. The county committee reserved the full percent it could reserve.

2. The committee reserved 15 percent of the total county allocation.

3. The amendment attached, if approved, would be of no benefit to this county.

4. If this county had 50 acres, with no strings attached, we could satisfy every cotton farmer in the county.

For the Monroe County committee:

HUGH W. MERCER,
County Administration Officer, Monroe County PMA.

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE,
PRODUCTION AND MARKETING ADMINISTRATION,
Jackson, Miss., January 16, 1950.

Hon. LINDLEY BECKWORTH,
House of Representatives.

DEAR MR. BECKWORTH: This is with reference to your letter of January 13 requesting information relative to the percentage of the State cotton allotment withheld as a State committee reserve.

Including the acreage set up by the Cotton Branch as a reserve for small farm increases, our State committee withheld 3.33 percent of the State allotment as a State committee reserve. According to Public Law 272, there were four specific items for which the State committee could withhold acreages as a reserve. These are as follows:

1. For trends.
2. For abnormal conditions affecting the planting of cotton.
3. Acreage for new farms.
4. Acreage for small farm increases.

No reserve was withheld on the State basis for trends. After a study of available data it was the opinion of the committee that a 4-year average represented about as direct a trend as any other trend formula that could have been worked out.

For abnormal conditions affecting the planting of cotton 0.56 percent was withheld. All of the adjustments for abnormal conditions were made in consideration of overflow conditions along the Yazoo River prevailing during the planting season in the counties involved. The adjustments were based on acreage data furnished by United States Army engineers and Federal Crop Insurance Corporation.

For new growers, 1.09 percent of the State allotment was withheld. This amount was estimated to be about one-half the needs for new growers in the State. County committees were required to withhold approximately one-half of the acreage that was estimated to be needed in each county for new growers. It was felt that this procedure would, in the long run, have a tendency to require county committees to screen applications for new growers closer than they might if all of the allotment for new growers was held out on the State level.

For small-farm increases, 1.68 percent of the State allotment was withheld. This acreage was the same amount that the Cotton Branch set up as a minimum that could be used for small-farm increases and, if not used for such purposes, would be "frozen." Therefore, the State committee did not withhold any additional acreage for small-farm increases because at the time the State committee withheld its reserve it was felt that this amount would be sufficient to provide the necessary increases for small farms as required by law.

No additional amount was withheld by the State committee as a State reserve because it was the understanding of the committee that it had withheld all that was allowed under the law—that is, for the four purposes specified in the act—even though it was realized that a maximum of 10 percent was authorized where it could be justified.

Very truly yours,

T. M. PATTERSON,
Executive Officer.

MONTICELLO, MISS., January 18, 1950.

Hon. LINDLEY BECKWORTH,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Lawrence County Cotton Committee did not reserve the full percent that could have been reserved. We reserved only 12 percent of the official county allotment, due to the fact that our acreage allotment was so small.

The amendment setting up 70 percent of the farmers actual acreage in 1946, 1947, 1948 would alleviate our troubles if the individual farmer received 70 percent of his actual planted acres in 1946–48.

Lawrence County needs additional acres of cotton to keep genuine cotton farmers and genuine cotton tenants farming. An additional 1,000 acres is needed for the county under the present set-up to justify the needs of the cotton farmers.

If additional acres are not given to this county many owners and tenants who have been depending on cotton for their only income will be forced to divert to some other means of making a living or lose their property.

Very truly yours,

DUDLEY O. MILLER,
Chairman, Lawrence County Committee, Production and Marketing Administration.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

There was no objection.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. WHITE of California asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include a letter from a citizen of his State.

Mr. DAVIS of Georgia asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include extraneous matter.

STATE DEPARTMENT

Mr. DAVIS of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Georgia?

There was no objection.

Mr. DAVIS of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, how long can respect for our State Department be maintained, and how long can confidence be retained in it when the head of that Department still hugs to his bosom a former employee and official of that Department who now stands exposed as an unquestioned betrayer of his country?

How long can respect for and confidence in our Supreme Court be maintained when one of its Justices is the man who sponsored this convicted betrayer of our country, and helped to place him in position where he could betray it?

How can there be a feeling of assurance that the American people can look for straightforward and constitutional decisions when questions are presented to the Supreme Court for determination which involves conflicts between communistic philosophies on the one hand and American principles on the other, when two out of the nine members of the Court endeavored to save this betrayer of our country from his just punishment?

This is the same Court which has been overruling established decisions, and insinuating into the body of our laws, by a process which might be termed "judicial legislation" new doctrines taken from the Communist Party line.

This is the Court where cases are now pending seeking to overthrow additional decisions, and upset established practices by the substitution of new and radical doctrines also taken from the Communist Party line philosophy.

On January 24 I called attention to the fact on the floor of this House that Frankfurter and Acheson, who have consistently upheld Alger Hiss and others of his stripe, are still occupying positions of power in our Government. I stated then, and I repeat now, that the conviction of Hiss for his betrayal of America to the Communists is but a scratch on the surface.

It is only a small part of the clean-up which is going to have to be made if we expect to save our country and our Government.

Our Government should be purged, root and branch, of all who aid and abet, directly or indirectly, those whose loyalty to our Government is even doubtful.

Birds of a feather flock together, and our Government should be cleansed of all those who countenance to any degree treason and disloyalty to the Government.

GEN. DOUGLAS MACARTHUR

Mr. HAYS of Arkansas. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Arkansas?

There was no objection.

Mr. HAYS of Arkansas. Mr. Speaker, 70 years ago today one of the most distinguished men in military history was born in my district in the city of Little Rock. When little Douglas MacArthur appeared at the home of Colonel and Mrs. Arthur MacArthur, perhaps, no one in the little city dreamed that he would achieve the great fame that has come to him in this generation.

Mr. MILLER of Nebraska. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAYS of Arkansas. I yield.

Mr. MILLER of Nebraska. I am glad to join with the gentleman from Arkansas in calling attention to the general's birthday. In 50 years as a soldier he has received 43 decorations and 10 campaign ribbons. He started in as an aide under President Theodore Roosevelt and now has the colossal job of work in Japan. He is a great statesman, a great soldier, and a Christian gentleman.

Mr. HAYS of Arkansas. I thank the gentleman from Nebraska.

Mr. CANFIELD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAYS of Arkansas. I yield.

Mr. CANFIELD. He was the No. 1 man in his graduating class at West Point.

Mr. HAYS of Arkansas. I felt that the House would want me to call attention to the fact that this is the general's birthday and to acknowledge appreciation of his monumental service to our country.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. HAYS] has expired.

EDUCATION OR TRAINING OF VETERANS

Mr. McSWEENEY, from the Committee on Rules, reported the following privileged resolution (H. Res. 447), which was referred to the House Calendar and ordered printed:

Resolved, That immediately upon the adoption of this resolution it shall be in order to move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union for the consideration of the bill (S. 2596) relating to education or training of veterans under title II of the Servicemen's Readjustment Act (Public Law 346, 78th Cong., June 22, 1944). That after general debate, which shall be confined to the bill and continue not to exceed 1 hour, to be equally divided and controlled by the chairman and ranking minority member of the Committee on Veterans' Affairs, the bill shall be read for amendment under the 5-minute rule. At the conclusion of the consideration of the bill for amendment the Committee shall rise and report the bill to the House with such amendments as may have been adopted and the previous question shall be considered as ordered on the bill and amendments thereto to final passage without intervening motion except one motion to recommit.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. GATHINGS asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include an editorial.

Mr. ALLEN of Illinois asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD and include an expression of an outstanding American, Mr. Justice Kirk, of the Appellate Court of Illinois.

SECRETARY OF STATE ACHESON

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Georgia?

There was no objection.

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, the statement made by the Secretary of State yesterday did not surprise me. It may, however, be terrifying to the people of this country. The Secretary seems to be completely oblivious of the gathering storm of public indignation which, when it breaks, will probably sweep his little Kremlin clean.

ALGER HISS—TREASON AT YALTA

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute, and to revise and extend my remarks and include a letter from the Committee on Un-American Activities.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Mississippi?

There was no objection.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, if Alger Hiss would only speak up now and tell the entire story, in my opinion, he could unmask a cabal of treachery to this country, the like of which America has never known.

A great many men have wanted to know how the Committee on Un-American Activities ever found Whittaker Chambers. They learned from other ex-Communists what he had been doing. The committee subpenaed Chambers, and when he came and laid the facts before them, Hiss was brought to trial.

They took something like a year to try the case in New York, and spent about a million dollars of the Government's money. The jury convicted Hiss without a dissenting vote.

I agree with what the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. Cox] has said, and I agree with what the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. DAVIS] has said. Our country has never been in more danger from within than she is today. For God's sake, let us protect America.

Let the Committee on Un-American Activities investigate the treason at Yalta, where the victory our boys had won was turned over to Communist Russia—the worst enemy our Christian civilization has ever known.

As I pointed out, a day or two ago, President Roosevelt was a sick man, both mentally and physically, at the time of the Yalta Conference; but the conspirators seemed to be wide awake and on the job.

At this point, I am inserting a letter from the senior investigator of the Committee on Un-American Activities telling how Whittaker Chambers was discovered and brought before the committee to give testimony that led ultimately to the conviction of Alger Hiss.

The letter referred to follows:

CONGRESS OF THE UNITED STATES,
HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
COMMITTEE ON UN-AMERICAN ACTIVITIES,
Washington, January 26, 1950.

Hon. JOHN E. RANKIN,
Member of Congress, House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. RANKIN: In response to your telephonic request of today for information on how the Committee on Un-American Activities first gained knowledge of Mr. Whittaker Chambers, the following facts contained in the records of the committee are set forth:

The Committee on Un-American Activities in early 1948, through confidential sources, obtained considerable information concerning Mr. Chambers' Communist affiliations and possible Communist underground operations. In April 1948, in connection with a case under investigation by the committee, two investigators interviewed Mr. Chambers in New York City. During the interview, Mr. Chambers acknowledged former membership in the Communist Party, and identified Nathan Witt, John Abt, Lee Pressman, Alger Hiss, Donald Hiss, Victor Perlo, Charles Kramer, Henry Collins, and Harold Ware (deceased) as having been members of a Communist apparatus in Washington, D. C., for the express purpose of infiltrating the Government.

The committee continued its investigation of this alleged Communist apparatus and several months thereafter uncovered Elizabeth Bentley, a self-confessed ex-Communist and courier for an espionage unit operating within the Government in Washington, D. C. Testimony regarding espionage activities within the Government involving approximately 30 individuals was given before the Committee on Un-American Activities by Miss Bentley on July 31, 1948. Among those identified by Miss Bentley were Charles Kramer and Victor Perlo, who had previously been identified by Mr. Chambers to members of the investigative staff as members of the Communist Party. Mr. Chambers was subpenaed to testify before the committee on August 3, 1948, to corroborate in part the testimony of Miss Bentley and to give additional testimony concerning Communist infiltration of the United States Government. In his testimony, Mr. Chambers identified Mr. Alger Hiss along with the other individuals he had named earlier to the investigators.

In subsequent hearings, Mr. Alger Hiss denied that he had ever been a member of the Communist Party or had participated in an underground Communist apparatus. Information developed in the hearings before this committee eventually led to the indictment of Mr. Alger Hiss in New York City and to his subsequent conviction for perjury in his testimony before the grand jury in New York City.

It is hoped that the above information satisfactorily answers your request.

Sincerely yours,

LOUIS J. RUSSELL,
Senior Investigator.

THE COAL SITUATION

Mr. ALLEN of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

There was no objection.

Mr. ALLEN of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I take this time to urge the membership of the House of Representatives, through you as Speaker of the House, to advise the President of the United States that we, the duly elected representatives of the people, feel that the President should immediately invite Mr. John L. Lewis and the representatives of the coal-mine operators to the White House for the purpose of allowing the President to appeal to both sides to agree to terms under which the mining of coal may be restored to normalcy—at least until the coal supply above ground has reached the point where the health and safety of the citizens of this Nation are not imperiled—while arbitration is carried on.

The Director of the Bureau of Mines has informed the President that coal stocks are at the danger point. The President has steadfastly refused to use the instruments given to him by the Congress to deal with the situation. It is now imperative that all of us recognize our oaths and ask that the President—however reluctant he may be—use his great office to protect the inherent rights of the citizens of this Nation.

Mr. Speaker, the House of Representatives has found itself divided on most issues since we reconvened in January, but I sincerely believe that on this plea to the President we should all find a common meeting ground.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. CHURCH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

[Mr. CHURCH addressed the House. His remarks appear in the Appendix.]

Mr. JONAS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

There was no objection.

[Mr. JONAS addressed the House. His remarks appear in the Appendix.]

THE SHORTAGE OF COAL

Mr. MICHENER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks and include resolutions dealing with the coal situation.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

There was no objection.

Mr. MICHENER. Mr. Speaker, may I call the attention of the President to the fact that Nero fiddled while Rome burned.

Within the last 24 hours Dr. James Boyd, head of the Bureau of Mines, one of the administration's fact-finding agencies, has advised the President and the country that there is a national emergency because of the lack of coal, that the people are suffering, and that the economy of the country is suffering and will be disastrously affected if present coal conditions are permitted to continue. What more does the President want before he is convinced that it is his duty—if not his pleasure—to use the Taft-Hartley law which the Congress has provided to put an end to this coal shortage? It seems that everybody but the President already knows there is a shortage of coal.

My good friend the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ALLEN] has just suggested that some days ago he went to the White House in person and asked that the President call in John L. Lewis and the coal operators and urge them to get together and compose their differences. The gentleman from Illinois is still of the opinion that this should be done. Mr. Speaker, that will only mean more delay—time is of the essence. The country wants something done now, not next week or next month. We have another cold spell in Michigan, and our people are getting desperate.

I am just in receipt of a message from the city of Monroe, Mich., including official resolutions depicting what is happening in that city of 22,000 so far as fuel coal is concerned. Just some more evidence as to actual coal shortages throughout the Nation. The resolution reads as follows:

Whereas despite rationing and curtailment of coal deliveries for 6 weeks, Monroe coal merchants are running short of coal, householders' bins are nearly empty in many cases, and the few shipments of coal reaching Monroe are insufficient to meet mounting demand; and

Whereas surveys reveal that if the present shortage continues the entire local coal supply may be exhausted within a few days, leaving a large proportion of homes in this community without means of heating and wholly at the mercy of severe weather; and

Whereas efforts to replenish supplies and build up a margin of safety are rendered fruitless by the national shortage, stemming from coal strikes and 3-day workweeks, and by the facts as reported in the press that other communities throughout the State and in other States are in a like dilemma: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Monroe City Commission, That a local emergency exists in that the public health and welfare is endangered by the critical shortage of coal; be it further

Resolved, That the President of the United States be informed of the emergency herein declared and respectfully requested to take such action as he may by law be empowered to take to relieve the same and the causes thereof; be it further

Resolved, That the contents of this resolution be communicated to Michigan Representatives in both Houses of Congress, and to the Governor of the State of Michigan.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. FENTON asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD and include an editorial.

Mr. JUDD asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD in four separate instances and in each to include extraneous material.

Mr. CLEVENGER asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD and include an editorial.

THE SECRETARY OF STATE AND ALGER HISS

Mr. JUDD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Minnesota?

There was no objection.

Mr. JUDD. Mr. Speaker, the shocking statement "I do not intend to turn my back on Alger Hiss," made by Mr. Dean Acheson, yesterday at a press conference, which he called as a high official of the Federal Government, the Secretary of State, illustrates again what has been the curse of this administration and its predecessor, personal government.

Mr. Acheson as an individual has a perfect right, of course, to choose as his cronies, whoever he wishes, and stick to them as he wishes; and I respect his determination as an individual to stand by anybody who has been a good friend of his. But as the Secretary of State, he is not just an individual. He has loyalties and responsibilities that must transcend any loyalties he may have as an individual. It is no longer Dean Acheson and Alger Hiss; it is the Secretary of State of the United States and a man who betrayed a trust, acting as an enemy of the United States. If the Secretary of State does not intend to turn his back on such a man, duly convicted in our courts of perjury regarding the most heinous of all crimes, treason, then a responsible Congress and the people of the United States must demand that the President of the United States turn his back on Mr. Dean Acheson as his Secretary of State.

WAGES IN THE SUGAR INDUSTRY

Mr. MURRAY of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Wisconsin?

There was no objection.

Mr. MURRAY of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, at this time when we are hearing so much about wage-and-hour legislation I think it is appropriate to again call attention to what is taking place under the Sugar Act. Our majority leader the gentleman from Massachusetts, the Honorable JOHN MCCORMACK, I am sure will remember that when we extended the Sugar Act he took a leading part in seeing that labor was included in the act. We do not need more legislation; all we need is some recognition of the fact that labor is labor, including sugar production. I realize that the rural population of this country is only 20 percent of the total population, but surely they are subject to the same labor-legislation benefits as other groups. As long as we maintain a minimum wage of 25 to 32 cents an hour under the Sugar Act, just so long will I believe that this administration is not too wholeheartedly interested in minimum wages.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin has expired.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. MILLER of Nebraska asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include an article on General MacArthur at 70.

Mrs. ST. GEORGE asked and was given permission to extend her remarks in the RECORD in two instances, in one to include a magazine article appearing in an English magazine Truth and in the other some remarks of Mr. GWINN, of New York.

Mr. VURSELL asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD in two instances and include extraneous matter.

Mr. HALE asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include extraneous matter.

Mr. GROSS asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include an editorial.

Mr. CANFIELD asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD in two instances and include an editorial in each.

Mr. WILLIAM L. PFEIFFER (at the request of Mr. KEATING) was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. KEATING asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD.

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. VURSELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

[Mr. VURSELL addressed the House. His remarks appear in the Appendix.]

DEAN ACHESON

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, I have heretofore asked that we get a new Secretary of State. I do not approve of the actions of the present incumbent. I have listened with great interest to the remarks of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. DAVIS] and the gentleman from Minnesota, WALTER JUDD, in reference to the State Department.

Mr. Speaker, from the things that have happened in China and other countries in the world, I do not know of anyone who has worked more for the interest of Mr. Joe Stalin than our Secretary of State, Dean Acheson. I think if Joe Stalin wants a new secretary of state we can spare Dean Acheson to the advantage of our country's welfare. No greater bomb can be thrown at our security than his defense and esteem for Alger Hiss, who was convicted by the courts of our land as a perjurer.

THE SUFFERING OF THE INDIANS OF MONTANA

Mr. D'EWART. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Montana?

There was no objection.

Mr. D'EWART. Mr. Speaker, I had a long distance telephone call last night from Mr. Hugo Aronson, a man I have known for years and whose statement can be relied upon. He told of the severe cold weather in Montana, the temperature averaging from 30° to 50° below. In addition, on the Blackfeet Reservation there has been snow until the roads and trails are blocked.

Last summer eastern Montana suffered a serious drought, along with a grasshopper infestation. The result is that on the Fort Belknap, Fort Peck, Rocky Boy, Northern Cheyenne, and Blackfeet Indian Reservations there is great suffering.

My friend visited the Blackfeet Reservation yesterday and he found Indian families without food and fuel; they were actually tearing up the floors in their cabins to use as fuel.

I personally visited these reservations in December and know of the dire situation that faces these Indians if adequate relief is not provided.

On the Fort Belknap Reservation, the income per family last year was only $350. On the Fort Peck the feed supply for livestock was only 25 percent of normal. The result is not only low income from the reservations, but also fewer jobs, and when there was a job, it was only short-time work. Therefore, the Indians have not been able to provide for themselves as they would normally.

Food and fuel are disastrously short. There is need for relief funds, hospital funds, food, and fuel.

The regional director, Mr. Paul Fickinger, is authority for the State, and reports funds are exhausted and 2,700 Indians need immediate help. Havre, Miles City, Forsyth, and other Montana cities have sent supplies and have tried to help in this difficult situation.

These Indians are wards of the Federal Government; we have assumed the responsibility for their welfare. There is terrific need and suffering.

On my return to Washington early this month, I called this situation to the attention of the Indian Bureau. Time and again I have emphasized the need for help. I shall ask the Appropriations Committee for additional relief funds.

I believe this is a matter that the Congress should know about. It is not the kind of a situation we want to have in this United States.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. SADLAK asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include an editorial.

Mr. MEYER asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD in two instances and include editorials.

Mr. FARRINGTON asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include an editorial.

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. SADLAK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute, and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Connecticut?

There was no objection.

[Mr. SADLAK addressed the House. His remarks appear in the Appendix.]

SPREAD BETWEEN FARMER AND CONSUMER

Mr. DOLLIVER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Iowa?

There was no objection.

Mr. DOLLIVER. Mr. Speaker, I received this morning some very interesting comments derived from the Bureau of Agricultural Economics concerning the squeeze that the farmers of the Midwest, the food producers of this Nation, are now undergoing.

The Bureau of Agricultural Economics of the Department of Agriculture summarizes the price spreads between the farmers and the consumers by computing the annual retail cost of a market basket of food for a family of three average consumers together with the distribution of this cost between the farmer and the marketing system. At the prices prevailing in July 1948, the annual retail cost of this market basket for three people would have been $712.

In October 1949 the same quantity of food could be purchased for $637. During this period when the retail cost of an annual food supply for a family of three was falling $75, the farm price of this food fell $69, while charges made for services performed after the commodities left the farm declined only $6.

THE LATE RICHARD T. BUCKLER

Mr. HAGEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute, to revise and extend my remarks and include a news item.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Minnesota?

There was no objection.

Mr. HAGEN. Mr. Speaker, I have a sad mission here today. I report to you the death of a former Member of the House and my predecessor in Congress, Richard T. Buckler, who passed to the great beyond last Monday at his farm home near Crookston, in Polk County, Minn. It is with a special feeling of sadness that I make this announcement since I served Mr. Buckler for 8 years as his secretary and assistant.

Many of the older Members of the Congress remember "Dick" Buckler when he served here in the Seventy-fourth, Seventy-fifth, Seventy-sixth and Seventy-seventh Congresses. They will recall his down-to-earth speeches here on agricultural questions and his fighting heart when it came to protecting the farmers of his district and the Nation.

It has been my pleasure and privilege to serve the Ninth District of Minnesota as his successor. He retired voluntarily from Congress and active public life because of his health and age. His service and work long will be remembered in the hearts of his old associates here and the many thousands of his friends and supporters in the Ninth District and the State of Minnesota.

Richard T. Buckler was born in Coles County, Ill., and in 1904 came to Polk County, Minn., where he has operated several sections of land successfully.

He was elected for his four terms here as a Farmer-Labor Representative and at one time was the only Member of that party in the House. While here, he made an enviable record, particularly on farm legislation. His advice and counsel were invaluable, indeed, to many of the men who served with him when it came to writing and debating laws relating to agriculture.

He had reached the age of 85 and lived a long and useful life as a member of the Minnesota Senate for 12 years; an active member of the Farm Bureau and Farmers Union since they were organized; State chairman of the Farmer-Labor Party, appointed by the late Governor Floyd B. Olson in 1924; and then elected to this House for four consecutive terms.

Mr. Buckler is survived by two sons and four daughters. Our deep sympathy is extended to them.

Funeral services are being held today in Crookston. Although we cannot be at those services in person, we are there in spirit, sadly remembering an old friend and regretting the passing of an outstanding public servant and a great Representative in this Congress.

Local mention was made in the Washington Evening Star in its issue of Tuesday, January 24, 1950.

The news article follows:

RICHARD T. BUCKLER DIES; FORMER HOUSE MEMBER

Richard T. Buckler, 85, a Farmer-Labor Party Representative from Minnesota who served four terms in Congress from 1935 to 1942, died yesterday on his farm in Crookston, Minn.

Mr. Buckler, who was born in Coles County, Ill., held numerous township and local school-district offices in Polk County, Minn., for 30 years. He had served as a State senator from Polk County for three terms before his election to the Seventy-fourth Congress on November 6, 1934.

Long known as a friend of the farmer and active in Farm Bureau and Farmers' Union organizations for years, he was a strong advocate of old-age pensions, the bonus, a central bank, and price fixing for farm products. He represented the Ninth Minnesota District in Congress. Mr. Buckler is survived by two sons and four daughters. Funeral services will be held Thursday in Crookston.

Mr. Buckler's biography as shown in the Congressional Directory for the Seventy-seventh Congress will be of interest at this time.

It follows:

Richard Thompson Buckler, Farmer-Labor, R. F. D., Crookston, Minn.; born in Coles County, Ill.; attended the common schools; engaged in farming in Andover Township, Polk County, Minn., since 1904; has held numerous township and local school-district offices in the past 30 years; served as State senator from Polk County for three terms, 12 years; active in Farm Bureau and Farmers Union organizations for many years; married on October 20, 1891, to Addie Ball, at Charleston, Coles County, Ill.; six children—five daughters and one son; member of Eagles lodge and the Baptist Church; elected to the Seventy-fourth Congress on November 6, 1934, receiving 41,822 votes and a plurality in 12 of the 15 counties in the district over Ole O. Sageng, Republican, 27,522 votes, and Martin O. Brandon, Democrat, 25,210 votes; in the election on November 3, 1936, Representative Buckler was elected to his second term in Congress by an increased vote and an increased plurality over 1934; he received a total vote of 48,265, compared to his Republican opponent's 31,181, and his Democratic opponent's total of 20,165; Mr. Buckler's plurality over the Republican nominee, Elmer A. Haugen, was 17,077, about 3,000 votes greater than his plurality 2 years previous; he secured a plurality in 14 of the 15 counties in the district, losing only Otter Tail County, the home county of his two opponents, where he lost to the Republican nominee by 3,180 and defeated the Democratic nominee, Martin O. Brandon, by 2,062; in Mr. Buckler's home county of Polk he received a plurality over the Republican nominee of 5,516 votes, and a margin of 6,571 over the Democratic candidate; was reelected to his third term by a comfortable margin over his Republican opponent and by 23,592 votes over the Democratic candidate, carrying 12 of the 15 counties in the district; has the distinction of being the only candidate running in the State of Minnesota carrying the Farmer-Labor label to win election and in face of the fact that the Farmer-Labor candidate for Governor lost the district by approximately 18,000 votes; in 1940 Congressman Buckler was reelected and again holds the distinction of being the only Farmer-Labor Party labeled candidate to win in the State of Minnesota in the 1940 elections; his 4 terms of 2 years each will give him a total of 8 years of Ninth District service which is the second longest in the history of the Ninth Congressional District of Minnesota, only Halvor Steenerson, also of Crookston, serving for a longer period.

Mr. H. CARL ANDERSEN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAGEN. I yield to the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. H. CARL ANDERSEN. Mr. Speaker, I would like to join my colleague from Minnesota in paying tribute to a fine gentleman who has just passed away, Richard Buckler.

Mr. WIER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAGEN. I yield to the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. WIER. I would like to join also as a Member from the State of Minnesota in paying eulogy to a grand old man who served the State of Minnesota and his constituency with a lot of courage, and a lot of work, and I know that the people of Minnesota will mourn his passing.

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAGEN. I yield to the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. I also had the privilege of serving with Mr. Buckler when he was in the House of Representatives. He was a grand American, and we extend our sympathy to his family.

Mr. HAGEN. I thank the gentleman.

DISPENSING WITH DISCHARGE DAY BUSINESS, MONDAY, FEBRUARY 13

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, for many years it has been the traditional policy of Congress not to have a session, or at least to transact no important business which would require a roll call, on Lincoln's Birthday. On that day a great many Republican dinners will be held all over the country. I believe this year there will be about 2,700 Lincoln Day dinners. Practically every Republican Member of the Congress has at least one and some have four or five speaking engagements.

It happens that the next 21-day discharge day is Monday, February 13, which complicates our situation. The Members must know now in order to arrange their schedules, whether or not we are going to have important business on that day. Therefore, may I inquire of the gentleman from Massachusetts if he can enlighten us as to what we might expect, and perhaps he might be able at this time to make a unanimous-consent request to dispense with the business in order on that day?

Mr. McCORMACK. It is my understanding that the gentleman from Massachusetts, the minority leader, is making this request as the leader of his party?

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. I am, at the request of a great many of the Republican Members.

Mr. McCORMACK. We all recognize that it works both ways. When we have our special days the same consideration is extended to the Members on the Democratic side by the Republican leadership and the Republican Members.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. May I say that we are only too happy to comply with such requests.

Mr. McCORMACK. That is a very basic situation that confronts the two political parties. Recognizing that, I personally think the only thing that can be done and should be done is to dispense with the business in order on the next discharge day, because each political party has to respect the responsibilities that devolve upon the other. I join in the statement of the distinguished minority leader that it has been the custom for years, no matter which party is in control of the House, for each party to recognize the responsibilities of the other. We on this side have our Jackson-Jefferson Day dinners, and during the Eightieth Congress time was allowed the Democratic Members to make the speeches that were attendant on such occasions.

Mr. HUBER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. HUBER. Inasmuch as if Abraham Lincoln were alive today he would be a Fair Dealer, I shall offer no objection to the request the gentleman intends to make.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. I have some doubts about the gentleman's assumption with regard to Abraham Lincoln.

Mr. McCORMACK. Thoroughly concurring with my friend from Ohio, but not desiring to make that an issue at the moment, I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Speaker, that the business in order on the next discharge day, Monday, February 13, be dispensed with.

Mr. EBERHARTER. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, of course, the Members understand that this will delay any possible action under the 21-day rule for 2 weeks. I wonder whether the unanimous-consent request could not be changed so that we could take up the business in order on discharge day on the Tuesday following Monday, the 13th.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. May I say to the gentleman that Members could not get back from the west coast by the following day.

Mr. EBERHARTER. Perhaps the request could be made for later in the week.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. I really do not think the arrangement would prevent any legislation from getting to the floor before the session is over.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, may I further ask the gentleman from Massachusetts what the program will be for tomorrow and Monday?

Mr. McCORMACK. The Committee on Rules has reported out a rule today on House Joint Resolution 398, relating to cotton- and peanut-acreage allotments and marketing quotas under the Agricultural Adjustment Act of 1938. The rule provides for 3 hours of general debate. I am programing this bill for tomorrow, but want to inform the House that consideration of the bill on tomorrow will be confined to general debate. The bill will be read for amendment under the 5-minute rule on Monday. I have a further agreement with the gentleman from Masschusetts [Mr. MARTIN], and the chairman of the committee, the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. COOLEY], that if there is any roll call on the bill on Monday, either on a motion to recommit or on passage of the bill, the roll call will take place on Tuesday.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. I am in accord with that understanding.

Mr. McCORMACK. Of course, that would require the unanimous consent of the House. Rather than wait until Monday, Mr. Speaker, I now ask unanimous consent that if on Monday, on a motion to recommit, if such a motion should be made, or upon the passage of the resolution (H. J. Res. 398), there is a roll call vote to be taken, the roll call will take place on the following day, Tuesday.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. DELANEY asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. FISHER asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include an address by Secretary of Defense, Louis Johnson.

CONGRESSIONAL MEMBERS SHOULD AVOID RUMORS, HEARSAY, AND GOSSIP AND STICK TO FACTS IN SPEECHES

Mr. DOYLE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California?

There was no objection.

Mr. DOYLE. Mr. Speaker, the reason I am taking this time to speak extemporaneously is that I feel impelled to again speak out against what I believe to be an erroneous habit and attitude here on the floor of this great Congress.

For instance, just a few minutes ago one of the distinguished Members of this House, having served here many years ably and well, spoke in such terms and language that it clearly would indicate to the American people that he believed, and was trying to get across to his colleagues in this Congress and the American people, that Dean Acheson, Secretary of State, was directly or indirectly aiding Joe Stalin. Yet, I am dead sure that this distinguished Member from Pennsylvania knows in his own heart and must carry consciously in his mind that he had no intention of even inferring that our State Department would consciously do anything to aid Joe Stalin in his political or economic philosophies.

Yet, Mr. Speaker, the language he used would clearly indicate through the press and over the wires that a Member of Congress was charging our State Department with being an aid and an assistant to Joe Stalin.

This, under the circumstances of the present world situation, does clearly add to confusion; to fear; to suspicion; to ill will; to national and even international misunderstanding as to what the facts really are. For, I say to my colleagues, that the distinguished gentleman uttered his intemperate words without basis in law or fact to substantiate his untimely and unwarranted remarks. And so it goes.

Granting that we have congressional immunity in what we say; granting that we are free to say what we wish on the floor of this Congress as Members of Congress without fear of libel or slander, this does not justify us in being any less diligent in sticking to the facts and the law and the truth than we would have our own constituents be in our respective congressional districts; does it? Why should we take liberties on the floor of this House in speaking of any matter when it is only sounds and rumor and gossip and "political dishwater"? Yes, even though most of us are candidates for reelection, even though the two-party system thrives and lives, partially at least, on account of the desire of those in the majority to stay in the majority, and those in the minority party to become the majority party, this does not justify members of either party in relating as facts or truth anything which is known to them to not yet be established as facts or as the truth.

A certain Good Book, many years ago, advised us to not be intemperate. This applies to speech as well as to personal habits. It most emphatically applies to us Members of Congress in these strenuous days of world anticipation, misunderstanding, stresses, and strains. Let us, therefore, be factual and temperate in our speeches and in what we say and in what we do. As Representatives of the American people, let us so conduct ourselves in our speeches from the floor of this Congress that the American people will consider us as examples of temperate speech and of temperate attitudes toward one another in our speeches. And let the two great political parties only enumerate and enunciate that which is founded in truth and facts; that which can be substantiated.

I said it before, in 1946, and I say it again: What we here say many times goes out over the Nation and over the world. By repetition it becomes garbled and exaggerated and even more extremely intemperate and destructive of truth and veracity. Millions of folks think and believe and repeat what we here state as the gospel truth. And those who are already inclined to be lacking in temperate speech and temperate mental attitudes toward their fellow citizens or rival political parties are given a further handle and circumstances to strengthen their intemperate attitudes and speeches and relationships.

Gentlemen of this House, let us by our daily words and conduct add to the sum total of our privilege and obligation which we especially have to strengthen the sinews of our American way of life. As democracy depends on an intelligent and well-informed participating electorate at the grass roots, so the American electorate depends upon us, as Members of Congress, both the House and the Senate, to be consciously temperate, truthful, accurate, and of careful and considerate speech in everything we say.

I believe, Mr. Speaker, to be conscious of having done less than substantially this, is to fail in one of our greatest obligations to the American people who look to us to only say and to only do that which has first been weighed and not found wanting, both in speech and in conduct. In this manner the sinews of our Nation will be made whole where lacking and will be made strong where weak.

On Tuesday, March 19, 1946, when I was a Member of the Seventy-ninth Congress, I said in part as follows, and my observations on that occasion will be found in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, volume 92, part 10, page A1507. Mr. Speaker, this viewpoint, which I this day urge to your attention, again emphasizing, and again reemphasizing, the same existing thing which I extemporaneously gave on March 19, 1946.

Following herewith are a few of my sentiments on that date:

My point is that too often Members state as facts matters they only hear about, through rumors, inaccurate, incomplete reports, and clearly erroneous reports. Why not wait until we know what the fact is before we speak out words which sound around the world?

What we as House Members say should be so carefully weighed and verified before we say it that no person will be misled or misguided because of what we have here said.

We have a peculiar responsibility for uttering words which should only sound in terms of accuracy in fact and law.

Granting that we have, and must have, certain privileges of speech as Members of Congress, the careless or thoughtless use of this may well result in an abuse of it—if it results in misinformation to the people of our own great Nation or of the world. I do not insinuate that any Member would knowningly mislead or misstate—but, if Members state as facts those things which are not just as stated, then the result of making report, based on rumor, hearsay, gossip, ill will, or intolerance, is weakening rather than strengthening to our national sinews. The dissemination as a fact of that which is not already verified to be in fact and truth is starting a chain of report throughout the Nation which cannot but weaken our democratic processes.

What is the truth about it? What are the basic facts? Even if we do not make a 1-minute talk the first time a newspaper or a radio commentator reports this or that, it would be safer for our international relationships if we did not so promptly condemn or castigate other nations, when an opinion given is based on first, an incomplete report, or rumor, or partisanship, or other factor which should cause us to pause and carefully consider before we utter words which can never be recalled.

What is said on the floor of this House makes toward the attitude of other nations and of their governments toward us as a nation. And, toward our President and our Senate and our Department administrators, and our Cabinet officers.

What do you suppose the thinking of foreign peoples is about the sincerity and efficiency of our two-party system of government, if they base their opinions upon the harshly spoken, ill-considered words frequently uttered against the efficiency and, in condemnation of the so-called bureaucracy of our Government?

In heat of debate, condemnation, unjust criticism, unfounded attack, unwarranted accusations, are said to often be made. Should we not seek to weigh our words most carefully, bearing in mind that what we say about the functioning of our own political parties and about our own form of government, is heard around the world?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. SABATH asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD in three instances and include extraneous matter.

THE FAIR EMPLOYMENT BILL

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

There was no objection.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, the Members of the House, particularly those who have inquired of me from day to day as to the consideration of a rule in the Committee on Rules and the many who are interested in the passage of the fair-employment bill, are entitled to know what transpired in the Committee on Rules today with regard to it.

You will recall that on Wednesday, January 18, the Committee on Rules deferred action and a vote on granting a rule on this important bill by reason of the absence of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. SMITH] and the gentleman from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH]. It was agreed then that a vote on a rule would be taken Tuesday, January 24, and all members of the committee were formally notified as to the meeting on that day. Two members of the committee were absent at this second meeting, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ALLEN] and the gentleman from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH], and it was urged that a vote be postponed until these members were present. A vote, however, was taken which resulted in a 5 to 5 tie and thereafter, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BROWN] made a motion for its reconsideration at today's meeting.

Today, however, we were again subjected to further delaying tactics of the type which have become chronic whenever the opponents of this bill are confronted with the necessity of going on record for or against bringing it to the floor.

Due to the unavoidable absence of the gentleman from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH] because of illness, his Republican colleague—with the silent but joyous approval of their Dixiecrat colleagues—insisted that the matter should again lay over until the full membership of the committee could be in attendance. They insisted that if I forced a vote for a rule on the FEPC bill today they would be obliged to vote against it.

So once more—the third time—committee action is deferred on this bill—in which millions of people are interested, of which a majority of the voters of the Nation have signified their approval in recent elections, and for the enactment of which both the Republican and Democratic Parties stand pledged in their 1948 platforms.

I, of course, intend no reflection upon the distinguished gentleman from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH], for whom I have the highest regard, when I point out the eagerness with which his Republican colleagues seized upon his absence as an excuse for further delay. As far as they are concerned one excuse is as good as another if it will keep the FEPC bill from coming to a vote.

It is a strange thing, however, that Mr. WADSWORTH'S absence was not invoked to delay action upon any other matter before the committee today.

For instance, House Joint Resolution 398, which will increase cotton acreage in the 1950 cotton season by 1,400,000 acres and will cost the Government hundreds of millions of dollars. Notwithstanding the Republicans' hypocritical cries for economy they voted for a rule for this bill and sent it to the floor for action of the whole House. Could it be, as some persons are beginning to suspect, that the unholy alliance of the GOP and Dixiecrats was at work in the strange coincidence of these two events?

Is it a possibility that there was an understanding between these strange bedfellows and that the Republicans voted for a rule for the cotton resolution, so dear to the heart of their southern friends, in exchange for delaying action against FEPC?

I wonder. And the people are beginning to wonder about these goings on.

But, to quote the Republicans' own great Lincoln whom they will proclaim on February 12, but whose wisdom they choose so often to ignore, "You can't fool all of the people all of the time."

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. PHILBIN asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD in two instances.

Mr. O'SULLIVAN asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD in two separate instances, and to include letters, newspaper articles, and editorials.

Mr. WEICHEL asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD in two instances.

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. PHILBIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

[Mr. PHILBIN addressed the House. His remarks appear in the Appendix.]

REPUBLICAN BALL CARRIERS FOR 1952 SHOULD BE "IKE" AND SINATRA

Mr. O'SULLIVAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Nebraska?

There was no objection.

Mr. O'SULLIVAN. Mr. Speaker, Mr. W. E. Britt, of Longmont, Colo., recently had this to say in its public writer's column of the Denver Post:

As E. P. Gallup, of Denver, said a few days ago, we must pray for a patriotic leader. Last month General Eisenhower said that the common people ought to stop thinking about pensions and get back to a "beer and hot dog" diet. Therefore, we should infer that Ike is a jolly fellow and a regular guy. He also said, "If all that Americans want is security, they can go to prison." This is a strong assertion by a strong man. The Republicans in 1952 should have attractive candidates. I suggest that the ticket be Eisenhower and Sinatra.

Not a bad idea, my friend—not a bad idea.

AMENDING THE HATCH ACT

Mrs. NORTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill H. R. 1243, an act to amend the Hatch Act, with Senate amendments thereto, disagree to the Senate amendments, and agree to the conference requested by the Senate.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentlewoman from New Jersey? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and appoints the following conferees: Mrs. NORTON, Mr. HARRISON, and Mr. LECOMPTE.

PROMOTION OF VETERANS OF WORLD WAR II IN THE FIELD SERVICE OF THE POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT

Mr. DELANEY, by direction of the Committee on Rules, reported the following privileged resolution (H. Res. 448, Rept. No. 1546), which was referred to the House Calendar and ordered printed:

Resolved, That immediately upon the adoption of this resolution it shall be in order to move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 87) relating to the promotion of veterans of World War II in the field service of the Post Office Department. That after general debate which shall be confined to the bill and continue not to exceed 1 hour, to be equally divided and controlled by the chairman and ranking minority member of the Committee on Post Office and Civil Service, the bill shall be read for amendment under the 5-minute rule. At the conclusion of the consideration of the bill for amendment, the Committee shall rise and report the bill to the House with such amendments as may have been adopted and the previous question shall be considered as ordered on the bill and amendments thereto to final passage without intervening motion except one motion to recommit.

SINCE I CANNOT PICK MY DISEASES, PLEASE LET ME PICK MY OWN DOCTOR

Mr. VAN ZANDT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

Mr. VAN ZANDT. Mr. Speaker, among the many letters I have received from my constituents on the issues of the day, there is one that really conveys a message in a few words.

The author of the letter is against socialized medicine and states her opposition in these few words:

I can't pick my diseases, but would like very much to have the privilege to pick my own doctor.

In my opinion the author of this statement echoes the sentiments of millions of American citizens.

PROCEEDINGS BEFORE THE RULES COMMITTEE

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio?

There was no objection.

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, mention was made a moment ago by the distinguished gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SABATH], chairman of the Rules Committee, that no consideration was given this morning to a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the committee took no action on reporting FEPC legislation, because of the absence of one of its members.

I would like to state that I personally made that motion to reconsider after voting against reporting of that legislation early this week, because of the absence of two of the minority members on the committee. The gentleman from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH] is now ill and in the hospital this morning. He has been ill since last Thursday when he had to leave the floor. He requested me and other members of the Rules Committee, as well as the chairman, not to take up that particular question until he would be able to be here. He stated he would know within 2 or 3 days whether he will be able to be here early next week, and indicated that if his illness should be of long duration he would not press his request that no action be taken until his return.

So I think, out of fairness, I should state the understanding was reached this morning that the Rules Committee would meet on Tuesday, and if it is found that the gentleman from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH] cannot return to the committee within a short and reasonable time, that the matter will not be held up further awaiting his presence.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Ohio has expired.

THE COMMITTEE ON RULES

Mr. McSWEENEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio?

There was no objection.

Mr. McSWEENEY. Mr. Speaker, as a member of the Committee on Rules, I am very anxious to pay deference to the request of any member of that committee for postponement of the consideration of any legislation. I was especially glad at other times to protect the interests of the gentleman from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH], who was unavoidably absent when important votes were to come up. But I do regret that when I was unavoidably detained at home and was trying to get here to vote on the resolution introduced by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. COX] to change the rules of the committee, no deference was made to my being absent, and I was not allowed to register any vote in opposition.

I hope the members of the committee will pay to the other members of the committee the same deference that we are glad to pay to the distinguished gentleman from New York.

PROXY VOTES IN COMMITTEE

Mr. EBERHARTER. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. EBERHARTER. Mr. Speaker, would it not be within the rules of the House for the Committee on Rules to permit a member to give his proxy to another member so a vote could be had on an important matter in which the whole country is interested?

The SPEAKER. That is a matter for the committee to determine.

The Chair may make this statement: He served on one committee for 24 years, and never was a proxy voted on that committee, because the present occupant of the Chair always voted against it.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. RANKIN. The rules of the House are the rules of every committee of the House, I, as chairman of the Committee on Veterans' Affairs, have taken the position that since the rules of the House forbid voting by proxy, under the same rule a member cannot vote by proxy in the committee. Am I right or not?

The SPEAKER. Committees have always been permitted to decide that question.

Mr. RANKIN. The rule states that the committees shall be governed by the rules of the House; that the rules of the House shall be the rules of every committee, and I do not believe a committee can change its own rules to permit absentee voting.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is going to hold as did Speaker Longworth, that it is a matter for the committee itself to determine.

TAXATION OF LIFE-INSURANCE COMPANIES

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union for the consideration of House Joint Resolution 371, relating to the income taxes of life-insurance companies for 1948 and 1949; and pending that motion, Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that general debate be limited to not to exceed 1 day, that it be confined to the bill, and that the time be equally divided and controlled by the gentleman from New York [Mr. REED] and myself.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from North Carolina?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion offered by the gentleman from North Carolina.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union for the consideration of House Joint Resolution 371, relating to the income taxes of life-insurance companies for 1948 and 1949, with Mr. GORE in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

By unanimous consent, the first reading of the bill was dispensed with.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. LYNCH].

Mr. LYNCH. Mr. Chairman, the purpose of House Joint Resolution 371 is to correct the statutory formula for the taxation of the income of life-insurance companies. This is stopgap remedial legislation. It is made necessary by the fact that the formula which was enacted in 1942 to determine the taxable income of life-insurance companies has proven wholly unrealistic. Under existing law no tax has been due from any company on its life-insurance investment income for the years 1947 and 1948, and probably none will be due for 1949. The proposed legislation would end the free ride and would make life-insurance companies pay their fair share of the tax burden which presently bears so heavily on individuals and corporations with taxable incomes.

Although the proposed legislation is retroactive, it does not come as a surprise to the life-insurance companies. For more than 2 years the representatives of the life-insurance industry and the Treasury have been holding conferences in an endeavor to work out a formula which would correct this situation. I should state, in fairness to the industry, that its representatives recognized the need to correct the formula and have shown every evidence of earnest cooperation. The result has been that this proposed legislation is acceptable to 95 percent of the industry. It has likewise the approval of the Treasury and the staff of the Joint Committee on Internal Revenue Taxation. It is the result of a unanimous report of the Subcommittee on Taxation of Life Insurance Companies of the Committee on Ways and Means. It is reported out of Ways and Means with only one dissenting vote. I doubt if any such complex and technical legislation has ever had such unanimity of approval, especially where it will cost the life-insurance companies in the neighborhood of between $90,000,000 and $93,000,000.

Before I take up the technical aspects of the bill, permit me to give you more of the background. The taxation of life-insurance companies has offered a special problem, which has long been recognized. Since the Revenue Act of 1921 special provisions of the income-tax law have applied to life-insurance companies. In the forepart of the last decade, although the business of life-insurance companies had risen by leaps and bounds, the revenues derived from taxes on the profits of these companies were growing smaller. In 1940 Federal revenues from taxation of life-insurance companies had declined to $738,000, or one-tenth of 1 percent of their net investment income. It was apparent that a new approach had to be made. Thus came about the formula in the present law, which I am told was suggested by the insurance companies. In the first year of its operation this new formula, in 1942, produced $27,000,000 in revenues, in 1943 and 1944 approximately $35,000,000 each year, in 1945 the revenues dropped to $24,700,000, in 1946 $21,800,000 and in 1947, 1948, and 1949 the formula failed utterly of its purpose and no income taxes under the formula were payable to the Government by the life-insurance companies. Today we face the issue whether the life-insurance industry, with assets approaching $60,000,000,000 and an annual net income of $1,500,000,000 shall be permitted to escape tax-free during those years.

As I have previously indicated, the overwhelming majority of the insurance companies are willing to bear their fair share of the expense of maintaining the Government under which they exist and prosper. They do not want to be placed in the position of being a big, prosperous industry, not contributing its fair share of the cost of government. Besides their own patriotic impulses, it is sound business judgment from the public-relations viewpoint.

Of course, there are some companies that are selfish and short-sighted. They do not want to pay any taxes if they can avoid it. They seek to take advantage of a defective formula legislated by Congress, on the representation of the industry. They overlook completely—and for their own tax-dodging purposes—that the representatives of the insurance industry have been in conference with the Treasury on this very subject for over 2 years, in an honest endeavor to reach a solution of the problem. Every life-insurance company in the country was aware of the situation and the industry was advised by the Treasury that, as prudent business practice, it should provide for a taxable contingency during that period. The loudest wail is from the Equitable Life Assurance Society of New York, with admitted assets as of December 31, 1948, of $4,900,000,000, with an increased surplus of $38,800,000. As a policyholder in Equitable, I do not feel too happy having my insurance company duck and dodge and weave in and out in an attempt to escape its fair share of the expenses of our Government. I am a taxpayer and it burns me up to have to pay income taxes on my moderate income for 1947, 1948, and 1949, while the Equitable, with a battery of legal talent, seeks to avoid the tax because, forsooth, December 31 came before the Congress was able to enact the law.

Let us first consider how insurance companies are taxed—perhaps I should say, how they are not taxed—under existing law. All insurance companies are subject to the same tax rates as other domestic corporations. Complex problems are presented, however, in determining how much of the excess of receipts of an insurance company over current expenses is taxable income, and how much must be set aside as reserves for the payment of future claims.

In the case of life-insurance companies—and this applies to stock companies as well as mutuals—gross income since 1921 has been restricted to interest, dividends, and rents, and deductions are limited to those allocable to such income. In addition, a special deduction has been allowed against net investment income to take into account the commitments in the insurance contract made to policyholders that premiums collected in excess of current risks will be assumed to draw interest at a given rate.

Since insurance policies are written with the understanding that earnings on reserves will be added to the reserve fund to meet the ultimate contractual liability, it is proper that such allowances be made in computing taxable income.

The $64 question, however, is: How much is required to be set aside to meet potential claims and how much is income that should be taxed just as the income of other corporations is taxed?

The present formula was advocated by representatives of the life-insurance companies and was written into the Revenue Act of 1942. Under this formula, the special deduction—called the reserve and other policy liability credit—is computed, with but minor exceptions, as follows:

First, 65 percent of the contractual commitments of the company to policyholders are assumed to be at the arbitrary rate of 3¼ percent.

Second, the remaining 35 percent of the contractual commitments to policyholders are assumed to be whatever is the actual aggregate average experience of all the life-insurance companies.

APPLICATION OF THE 1942 RULES

At the time of enactment of the Revenue Act of 1942, it was not too unrealistic to assume that the companies needed 3¼ percent of their reserves to meet their policy-interest obligations. However, in recent years there has been a substantial decrease in the interest rates assumed by the companies on policy reserves. Consequently, although the life-insurance industry under the 1942 formula paid $27,500,000 in taxes in 1942 on net investment income slightly over $1,000,000,000, in 1947, 1948, and 1949 no taxes whatever are payable on annual net-investment income 50 percent greater than that for 1942.

CORRECTION OF THE 1942 FORMULA

The effect of House Joint Resolution 371, as amended by the committee, is to correct the 1942 formula by eliminating entirely the arbitrary and unrealistically high 3¼ percent assumed rate of contractual commitments to policyholders. Instead, the credit ratio would be calculated entirely on the basis of the average experience of the industry in the preceding year for all outstanding contracts of insurance. A technical exception would omit the experience of any company whose contributions to policyholders' reserves exceed its net-investment income.

The Secretary of the Treasury recommended stopgap legislation along the lines contained in House Joint Resolution 371, as introduced, to yield about $90,000,000 for 1948 and 1949. The committee, however, felt that it would be more equitable to spread the same approximate tax liability over the 3-year period, 1947, 1948, and 1949. We did not believe that any industry in any year should escape tax liability. The result of the committee amendment is to collect approximately the same amount for each of the three taxable years, 1947, 1948, and 1949 as was collected during the period when the 1942 formula was operating as it was intended to function.

OBJECTIONS TO HOUSE JOINT RESOLUTION 371

The suggestion has been made that the pending legislation should properly await the general tax-revision bill. However, the proposed solution is already being challenged as unconstitutional on grounds of retroactivity. Although the Committee on Ways and Means has carefully studied all relevant Supreme Court decisions, and is convinced that such charges are unfounded, the committee does agree that there should be no unwarranted delay in correcting the mistake in the Revenue Act of 1942.

The chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means introduced House Joint Resolution 371 on the same date that he received the recommendations of the Treasury Department. Two days later a subcommittee, of which I was chairman, was appointed to study the problem during the adjournment of Congress. The pending measure is based upon the recommendations of that subcommittee.

CONSTITUTIONALITY OF RETROACTIVE INCOME TAXES

No Federal income tax has ever been held invalid on the ground that the tax was retroactively imposed. Taxpayers have, on a number of occasions, contended before the Supreme Court that the retroactive application of an income tax constituted a deprivation of property without due process of law and therefore was prohibited by the fifth amendment. In every case the Supreme Court held that the retroactivity involved did not offend the due-process clause of the fifth amendment.

Nearly all of the acts of Congress imposing an income tax have had some degree of retroactivity. The practice started nearly 90 years ago when the act of August 5, 1861, taxed income received during the entire calendar year 1861. The joint resolution of July 4, 1863, imposed an additional tax on incomes received during the calendar year 1863. This additional tax was imposed after the taxes for 1863 had already been paid at the rates established by an earlier act. In Stockdale v. Insurance Companies (20 Wallace 323), the Supreme Court said with respect to the validity of the retroactive tax imposed by the joint resolution of July 4, 1864:

> The right of Congress to have imposed this tax by a new statute, although the measure of it was governed by the income of the past year, cannot be doubted. * * * no one doubted the validity of the tax or attempted to resist it.

The act of October 3, 1913, applied to income received after March 1, 1913. The retroactivity of the tax was held valid in Brushaber v. Union Pacific Railroad (240 U. S. 1). The Revenue Act of 1918, which was enacted into law on February 24, 1919, applied to income received during 1918. Many other examples of similar retroactivity of the revenue acts could be cited.

An important exercise by the Congress of its power to impose retroactive income taxes can be found in the Revenue Act of 1936 which was enacted on June 22, 1936. On January 6, 1936, the Supreme Court in United States v. Butler (297 U. S. 1), held that the processing taxes levied by the Agricultural Adjustment Act were invalid. Many processors had been unjustly enriched in that, not having paid the processing taxes, they had nevertheless passed the taxes on to their purchasers. The Revenue Act of 1936 imposed the so-called windfall tax on such unjust enrichment and the tax was retroactively made applicable to taxable years ending in 1935. Thus, the 1936 act reached back and taxed, in the case of a taxpayer having a fiscal year beginning February 1, 1934, and ending on January 31, 1935, the income resulting from unjust enrichment for a taxable year which began more than 23 months prior to the date of the enactment of the Revenue Act of 1936. The retroactive imposition of the windfall tax was held valid in the case of White Packing Co. v. Robertson (89 Fed. 2d 775).

The most recent important case of the Supreme Court on the validity of a retroactive income tax is Welch v. Henry ((1938) 305 U. S. 134). The case involved an act passed in 1935 by the legislature of the State of Wisconsin, imposing a tax on corporate dividends received in 1933. Under the Wisconsin income tax existing during 1933, certain corporate dividends were exempted from tax. The 1935 act imposed an income tax, at graduated rates, on the dividends received in 1933 which were not taxed in 1933. The taxpayer received some $12,000 of the exempt type of dividends in 1933. He filed his income-tax return for the year 1933 during 1934, at which time he had no intimation that he would later be called upon for a tax upon the dividends. He contended that the tax imposed in 1935 was invalid on the ground, among others, that the retroactive tax violated the due process clause of the fourteenth amendment. The supreme court of Wisconsin held the act valid and the decision was affirmed by the Supreme Court of the United States. Justice Stone, speaking for the Court, said in part:

> The objection chiefly urged to the taxing statute is that it is a denial of due process of law because in 1935 it imposed a tax on income received in 1933. But a tax is not necessarily unconstitutional because retroactive. * * * Taxation is neither a penalty imposed on the taxpayer nor a liability which he assumes by contract. It is but a way of apportioning the cost of government among those who in some measure are privileged to enjoy its benefits and must bear its burdens. Since no citizen enjoys immunity from that burden, its retroactive imposition does not necessarily infringe due process, and to challenge the present tax it is not enough to point out that the taxable event, the receipt of income, antedated the statute.
> * * * In each case it is necessary to consider the nature of the tax and the circumstances in which it is laid before it can be said that its retroactive application is so harsh and oppressive as to transgress the constitutional limitation.
> * * * We cannot assume that stockholders would refuse to receive corporate dividends even if they knew that their receipt would later be subjected to a new tax or to the increase of an old one. The objection to the present tax is of a different character and is addressed only to the particular inconvenience of the taxpayer in being called upon, after the customary time for levy and payment of the tax has passed, to bear a governmental burden of which it is said he had no warning and which he did not anticipate.
> Assuming that a tax may attempt to reach events so far in the past as to render that objection valid, we think that no such case is presented here. * * *
> The equitable distribution of the costs of government through the medium of an income tax is a delicate and difficult task. In its performance experience has shown the importance of reasonable opportunity for the legislative body, in the revision of tax laws, to distribute increased costs of government among its taxpayers in the light of present need for revenue and with knowledge of the sources and amounts of the various classes of taxable income during the taxable period preceding revision. Without that opportunity accommodation of the legislative purpose to the need may be seriously obstructed if not defeated.

The Supreme Court has never attempted to define a boundary line beyond which Congress cannot retroactively impose an income tax. The boundary line, wherever it may be, must necessarily be vague. Each case must be judged, as the courts have done in the past, on its own merits, rather than by a fixed rule of metes and bounds. A particular income tax imposed under one set of circumstances may be held valid when applied retroactively X number of years, while another income tax, under different circumstances, might very well be held arbitrary and capricious when applied retroactively the same number of years. The problem resolves itself simply to an answer to this question: Has the Congress in retroactively imposing a particular tax under the circumstances in which it is laid acted unfairly and in an arbitrary and capricious manner?

Tested by the standard just stated, there is no doubt that House Joint Resolution 371 does not offend the fifth amendment. It proposes to tax the life-insurance companies for the years 1947, 1948, and 1949 on income which escaped taxation during those years; income which Congress had every intention of taxing when it enacted the Revenue Act of 1942. Certainly the dire need at this time of the Government for revenue is sufficient justification for the Congress to now impose on the life-insurance companies the tax on income for 1947, 1948, and 1949 which quite fortuitously escaped taxation due to the operation of the defective formula. It could hardly be contended by the life-insurance companies that a retroactive correction by the Congress of the formula is harsh, oppressive, or unjust. It can fairly be stated, I am sure, that the life-insurance companies have been embarrassed by the fact that the 1942 formula produced no revenue for the Government from the insurance companies for the years 1947, 1948, and 1949, years in which other taxpayers were paying heavy taxes resulting from the costs of World War II and its aftermath. I am confident that the life-insurance industry, almost unanimously, and the Supreme Court, if the question is ever presented to it, will agree that the retroactive correction of the formula in the manner proposed by House Joint Resolution 371 is consonant with justice and will impose no hardship upon the life-insurance industry.

In addition to the charge of unconstitutionality, the joint resolution has been criticized because it continues the principle of computing the reserve and other policy liability credit on an industry-wide basis, rather than on the experience of the individual company. Since the purpose of the resolution is to correct—not completely rewrite—the 1942 formula, it would be neither fair nor practical to thresh out anew, in the short time available, the issue that was then resolved in favor of taxation on an industry-wide basis.

This issue, as well as the question whether life-insurance companies should include in the tax base underwriting income and income from other sources, in addition to a larger share of net investment income, will, I trust, be considered in the preparation of the tax-revision bill.

Meanwhile, Mr. Chairman, it is my solemn conviction that House Joint Resolution 371, as amended, provides a constitutional, equitable, and practical stopgap solution of a serious error in the present formula for the taxation of life-insurance companies.

Mr. EBERHARTER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LYNCH. I yield.

Mr. EBERHARTER. I congratulate the gentleman on his intelligent and logical exposition of a quite complicated and technical problem. I am sure it will come as a shock to the taxpayers of the country to know that these insurance companies which have been making such huge profits have escaped without the payment of a single cent in taxes during the last 3 years.

Mr. LYNCH. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LYNCH. I yield.

Mr. COOPER. I am glad to join in the commendation made by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, and congratulate the gentleman from New York who served as chairman of the subcommittee which devoted a great deal of time and effort on this very difficult subject and which presented a unanimous report to the Committee on Ways and Means. I think the subcommittee has done a tremendous job in handling this difficult problem. May I ask the gentleman to emphasize one point, namely, that this is in the nature of emergency and stopgap legislation and that it is contemplated the Committee on Ways and Means will give further study and consideration to this subject with a view to reporting and recommending permanent legislation on the subject; is that correct?

Mr. LYNCH. That is absolutely correct.

Mr. COOPER. It is thought by the subcommittee that this is the best way to handle the problem as it is now presented, and the subcommittee in its report has recommended that further study and consideration be given the question so that permanent legislation may be worked out in connection with the revision of the revenue laws that the Ways and Means Committee is expected to soon undertake.

Mr. LYNCH. That is quite correct. The recommendation of the subcommittee was that this should be considered only as stopgap legislation, and that we should go further into the question when the full committee met on the discussion of the revision of the entire tax law.

Mr. COOPER. I concur in the opinion expressed by the gentleman, and I think this is a splendid resolution and should receive the unanimous approval of the House.

Mr. LYNCH. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LYNCH. I yield.

Mr. CURTIS. The gentleman has made a very fine statement. I would like to ask him this: This situation whereby the life-insurance companies have paid no tax was not the result of any conniving on their part or any deliberate attempt to escape taxes, was it?

Mr. LYNCH. I do not think they had any such thing in mind. I think when they submitted their proposal in 1942 as I understand it was submitted by them, it was checked by committee tax experts, and it was thought at that time that the proposal would work out. The fact of the matter is it did work out very well for the first year or so.

Mr. CURTIS. Could it be said that the situation which arose was not one that the Congress intended or was striving for; that the Congress had shown no desire to give any special privilege to the life-insurance companies?

Mr. LYNCH. I think it is quite definite that the Congress never had any intention that any special consideration would be shown to the life-insurance companies whereby they might escape any income taxes.

Mr. CURTIS. If there was any error in connection with this whole matter, anything that could have been avoided, it is the fact that perhaps Congress did not act quite as quickly as it might, and now we have to resort to something that we do not like; that is, the retroactive feature?

Mr. LYNCH. I think the Congress has acted as promptly as it could under the circumstances, for the reason that this matter was called to the attention of the industry in the fall of 1947. The industry itself had gone to the Treasury Department at approximately the same time, because they were fearful of the situation that they saw was arising. All during 1947, 1948, and 1949, they tried to work out with the Treasury some solution of this complex problem, to determine just exactly what was taxable income. When that could be determined, of course, the rates applicable to other corporations would follow:

Mr. CURTIS. At one time, something over a year ago, the committee was considering this subject, and at that time the Treasury suggested that we wait. Is that not true?

Mr. LYNCH. The Treasury had submitted a proposal to the Committee on Ways and Means when Mr. Knutson was chairman. Then I understand that the industry asked if they might not check back with the Treasury again on the legislation which was being proposed, and as a result of that the Treasury Department withdrew its recommendation so as to give further consideration to the viewpoint of the life-insurance industry.

Mr. CURTIS. In other words, when the tax-revision bill passed the House of Representatives in the Eightieth Congress, and when it was being prepared in our committee, the Under Secretary of the Treasury did withdraw his recommendation, suggesting that we pass the subject at that time? Is that not correct?

Mr. LYNCH. That is absolutely correct.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LYNCH. I yield.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Following the line of questioning by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. COOPER], in calling this stopgap legislation, will it leave it necessarily for the Congress at some subsequent date to pass legislation which is again retroactive?

Mr. LYNCH. No; I do not believe it will, because if we are able, as I hope we will be, although there may be some difficulty about it, to hold the necessary hearings and develop legislation for a new tax bill, then, of course, there will not be any necessity for any retroactivity. On the other hand, if we are not able to do it, the subcommittee has recommended that this legislation be extended in 1950—in the event that we are not able to agree upon permanent legislation in the general tax bill that will be taken up.

Mr. CRAWFORD. I am afraid I did not make my question clear. What I want to know is whether it will be necessary to pass retroactive legislation embracing the period covered by this resolution? In other words, does this resolution take care of all contingent liabilities of the insurance companies effectuated in their tax returns for the period covered in the resolution?

Mr. LYNCH. All life-insurance companies; yes.

Mr. CRAWFORD. That is what I mean, the companies covered by the resolution.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LYNCH. I yield.

Mr. COOPER. I wish to understand the gentleman clearly, if he will indulge me a moment.

Mr. LYNCH. I yield.

Mr. COOPER. As I understand the question, the gentleman from Michigan is asking of the distinguished gentleman from New York, chairman of the subcommittee that worked on this problem, it is whether if this resolution is passed and this approximately $93,000,000 of revenue to the Government is paid by the life-insurance companies for the years 1947, 1948, and 1949, whether legislation subsequently considered and reported by the Committee on Ways and Means is likely to cover those same 3 years for these life-insurance companies; is that the question?

Mr. CRAWFORD. That is exactly my question.

Mr. LYNCH. I think that when we have passed the pending measure that is all there is to it. This will be permanent legislation insofar as the years 1947, 1948, and 1949 are concerned.

Mr. CRAWFORD. One other question, if the gentleman will permit. Did the gentleman and his committee find that the insurance companies covered by this resolution have, generally speaking, set forth the necessary reserves to take care of this liability?

Mr. LYNCH. Yes.

Mr. CRAWFORD. In other words, they have been conscious enough of the pending situation to take care of that?

Mr. LYNCH. Unquestionably so.

Mr. CRAWFORD. To the extent, therefore, that the companies did set aside such reserves in anticipation of this legislation's becoming law, they are clean after December 1, 1949; is that correct?

Mr. LYNCH. That is correct.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LYNCH. I yield.

Mr. COOPER. The gentleman has very clearly stated the situation that now exists, in that by operation of the formula included in the Revenue Act of 1942 it has resulted that the life-insurance companies have not been required to pay an income tax for the last 3 years. I will ask the gentleman if it is not true that to some extent at least a contributing factor to that situation was the general lowering of interest rates throughout the country?

Mr. LYNCH. That is correct.

Mr. DINGELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LYNCH. I yield.

Mr. DINGELL. I am not going to take any time on this bill, but at this point I would like to interpose an observation and elicit from the gentleman an expression as to whether he agrees with my statement. Is it not true that where the welfare of the insured people of this country is concerned, especially in the matter of life-insurance beneficiaries, Congress is loath to risk any possibility of the impairment of the financial status or solvency of the insurance companies? Back in 1942, therefore, it was agreed to adopt a certain formula which would impose and capture a certain amount of taxes but provide a deduction taking into account the obligations of the insurance companies to build up reserves to meet liabilities to the beneficiaries of the insured without any question of doubt?

Mr. LYNCH. That is correct.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has again expired.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 10 additional minutes.

Mr. DINGELL. Mr. Chairman, what has gone wrong is partially the formula which was agreed to and adopted and which became legal for this period of time. The formula plus a lowering of interest rates brought about a condition which permitted the insurance companies to retain a volume of profits far in excess of what was needed as a legal reserve to secure the payment of all obligations to policyholders.

Since this has developed, the insurance companies in good faith have made a clean breast of it to the Treasury Department. The Treasury Department presented the matter to the committee. The committee went into it further. We have presented here at this time what the gentleman once told me was about the equivalent, or it so appears to me as a layman, of what is termed in court procedure a consent agreement or a consent decree. The Congress is now asked merely to validate it and make it applicable to the years 1947, 1948, and 1949.

Subsequent and permanent legislation will require the most thorough consideration of this problem so as to be sure that we skim off every dollar that is not necessary for the solvency of legal-reserve companies.

Mr. DONDERO. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LYNCH. I yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. DONDERO. Was there anything shown before the committee which would compel the insurance companies—I think this has been answered indirectly—to increase their premium charges against policyholders in order to maintain their solvency and necessary reserve which the law requires as a result of the tax provided by the pending bill?

Mr. LYNCH. There has been no suggestion by those with whom we met, and we discussed this matter with the representatives of 95 percent of the insurance companies that it would in anywise affect the solvency of any company.

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 10 minutes.

Mr. Chairman, first of all I wish to pay my respects to the chairman of the subcommittee upon which I had the honor to serve. The conferences were conducted with great tact and in a spirit of absolute friendliness. The officials of the insurance companies representing the larger part of the insurance business of this country were present. They went into conference with their respective boards and the legislation here is the result practically of almost unanimous agreement, certainly as far as 90 percent of the companies are concerned.

It is very vital for us to be careful, of course, in the consideration of legislation of this character and the subcommittee was careful. The full committee listened with great patience and interest to the report of the subcommittee. When you realize that there are something like 191,000,000 life-insurance policies in this country, 109,000,000 of which constitute industrial insurance policies, you must come to a realization that it affects a great many people and their future security. So the subcommittee was very circumspect, as was the full committee, in the consideration of this temporary legislation.

Mr. Chairman, the administration would like to create the impression in the mind of the public that our great life-insurance companies have sought by sharp practice to escape their just burden of Federal taxes. It is not the fault of the life-insurance companies that they failed to earn taxable income for 3 years under the law. I shall point out why the legislation embodied in House Joint Resolution 371 as amended is necessary at this time.

It is true that no life-insurance company paid any income tax on the income from its life-insurance operations for 1947 and 1948. Under existing law the same thing would occur for 1949.

Yet, as everyone knows, the life-insurance business is one of the great businesses of the country. At the end of 1948 the assets of the 584 legal-reserve life-insurance companies of the United States were worth over $55,000,000,000, and their total investment earnings—to say nothing of underwriting income—amounted to $1,500,000,000 in 1948. During this period the surplus and contingent reserves of these companies increased substantially for some of the large companies, financial giants, these increases amounted to many millions of dollars.

There was nothing reprehensible about the failure of these great and small life-insurance companies to pay income taxes for these years. It was all in accordance with the law. For 1947 and 1948 deductions allowed by the law to each company exceeded the net investment incomes, so there was no income left to tax. The same situation will exist for 1949. Yet, to almost anyone it would seem a very strange thing that this great industry should earn no taxable income for 3 years. It would seem that there must be something wrong with a law that produced such an extraordinary result.

There is something wrong with the provisions of existing law, which have remained unchanged since they were enacted as part of the Revenue Act of 1942.

Every life-insurance company must set aside a large part, usually more than 90 percent, of its net investment income to maintain its reserves and meet its other obligations to its policyholders. Under existing law each company is allowed to deduct a percentage of its net investment income, representing that part of its net investment income needed for its policy obligations, and taxes at the ordinary corporation rates are payable on the balance. The percentage is determined and proclaimed each year by the Secretary of the Treasury, and is the same for all companies. The percentage is derived in accordance with a formula provided in the law, on the basis of data of the entire industry for the preceding year. It was because the formula contained an element which did not change, although conditions in the industry changed, that it became unworkable. The percentage for 1947 and 1948 became more than 100 percent, so that the deduction for each company exceeded its net investment income, and there was nothing left to tax.

The important element in the formula is the reserve earnings rate, intended to reflect the average or normal rate of interest used by the various companies in computing their reserves. Under existing law this rate is a composite of a fixed rate, 3¼ percent, weighted 65 percent, and the actual average rate of all the companies for the preceding year, weighted 35 percent. For 1942 and 1943 this was about right, since the actual average rate of the 50 largest companies for 1941 was 3¼ percent. But in succeeding years, as the rate earned on their investments declined, new policies were issued by most companies on the basis of an interest rate of 2½ percent or even 2 percent. By 1947, therefore, the average reserve rate for all companies was no longer 3¼ percent, but slightly less than 3 percent. The continued use of the fixed 3¼ percent rate thus allowed the companies to deduct, with respect to their policy obligations, more—on the average—than they were actually obligated to set aside.

This resolution would correct that situation, by substituting for the fixed 3¼ rate the actual average reserve interest rate for all companies for the preceding year. The representatives of the life-insurance industry told the members of the subcommittee of which I was a member that the various companies wanted to pay a fair tax. They admitted that the industry had income which would reasonably be viewed as taxable income for 1947, 1948, and 1949. All that this resolution, House Joint Resolution 371, does is to impose the taxes that should have been imposed, under the general theory adopted in 1942, for those years.

As has been well brought out on the floor here, the real difficulty was not due to any irregularity on the part of the insurance companies. They were absolutely honest in this. They had no income under the formula to tax. After working with the Treasury and finally working with our subcommittee, they came in voluntarily, a great majority of them, and were anxious to pay in something like $90,000,000 or $93,000,000 in taxes. I think they are entitled to just praise for their liberality if you want to put it that way, and their wish to stand in proper relationship to the public. I do not think they are subject to criticism. I think they should be commended, because under the 1942 law, as I say, they had no net income in 1947, 1948, and probably in 1949, and they could have insisted on their right not to be taxed. However, they are here, and they have cooperated with the subcommittee, under the fine leadership of the chairman of the subcommittee.

Mr. Chairman, I hope this resolution will be passed without serious opposition.

Mr. LYNCH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. REED of New York. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. LYNCH. I agree with the gentleman entirely when he states that there was no thought on the part of the industry to get away with taxes originally. They had not paid any taxes for 1947, 1948, and 1949, for the sole reason that under the present law they were not required to do so.

Mr. REED of New York. That is the answer. I thank the gentleman very much.

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. REED of New York. I yield to the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. They could not pay any tax because their earnings were down so far that they were barely able to maintain the reserves necessary to protect the policies.

Mr. REED of New York. The gentleman is not entirely correct.

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. They were down in earnings because the Government has appropriated most of the sources of investment for the insurance companies, and the Government has become the loaning agency of the country rather than the insurance companies and banks and the other financial institutions.

Mr. REED of New York. I did not care to get into any political discussion at all, but I am telling you now that with the venture capital drying up in this country it is very fortunate that the insurance companies can loan to industry and to the Government.

Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. JENKINS].

Mr. JENKINS. Mr. Chairman, I am not especially proud of the fact that I find myself in disagreement with my colleagues on the Ways and Means Committee. I am glad that there is no problem of morals or honesty or integrity involved between us, so that we will not fall out in debating the issues now before us. I am sorry to say that I cannot go along, but I am proud to say that I have good reasons that satisfy my own conscience and justify my actions.

In the first place, I would have you know that the insurance companies do not manifest as much unanimity with reference to this bill, as the former speakers have indicated. I maintain that there are many large insurance companies opposed to this measure. The insurance business, as we all know, is a great business. I do not know but that it is the greatest business in the country. I expect there are a million insurance collectors and salesmen of all kinds in this country and practically everybody has one or more insurance policies. This is a big business. I repeat, do not let us get the idea in our minds that all the insurance companies are in favor of this measure. They are not.

Mr. DONDERO. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JENKINS. I yield.

Mr. DONDERO. As I understand it, there are about 72,000,000 policyholders in the United States.

Mr. JENKINS. There are millions of policyholders.

Mr. MICHENER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JENKINS. I yield.

Mr. MICHENER. The Metropolitan Life Insurance Co. is the largest insurance company in the world and it has 33,000,000 policyholders with $9,000,000,000 plus in reserves.

Mr. JENKINS. I am glad to have the contribution of the two gentlemen because what they say bears out my statement that this is a great business.

Mr. LYNCH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JENKINS. Yes, I cannot refuse to yield to my distinguished colleague.

Mr. LYNCH. I just want to say in answer to the statement made by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MICHENER] that the Metropolitan Life Insurance Co. is one of the companies in favor of this legislation.

Mr. JENKINS. While we are talking about the companies that are not in favor of this legislation, I have cited you a few that I mentioned in my report which is appended to the report of the committee. Among those named are some of the largest insurance companies in the country and I think one of them is the largest company in the great State of Ohio. They are bitterly opposed to this legislation, not because they do not want to pay taxes, not because they stand under any cloud of any kind, moral or otherwise—they have done their part. They say that this formula favors some insurance companies and does not do justice to others. You know that one of the cardinal principles of taxation is that taxes must be just. They must be fair; they must be general in their application. This program does not meet all of those tests, because there are too many insurance companies that are opposed to this program, which proves that many of those directly interested in the matter are not satisfied. Of course, I do not want to stand here now and say to you that the policyholders of all these companies are liable to lose. That is not a condition precedent to taxation. We do not have to wait until people break up in order to hold them liable for taxes. We do not tax people until they go into bankruptcy. A man does not have to show that he is not a bankrupt in order to escape having to give up all he has to pay taxes. Taxation is a science and it is a science built on a solid foundation. It is American. Nobody loves to pay taxes but people and corporations usually pay what they justly owe. But if we pass this law today we levy a tax on companies for 3 years back. We try to collect from people who we know do not lawfully owe anything. If Congress can do that to insurance companies then it can do that to you and me. If we can go back and levy taxes on these insurance companies for 3 years back, which they did not owe, then I will leave it to anyone who supports this bill to say whether we could not do that to every corporation.

Did these insurance companies owe the tax in 1947? Was there any statute which made them liable? Was there any statute which made them liable in 1948 or 1949? They were not liable. Now you go back and say, "We are going to tax you. We are going to make you pay." Why did you not make them pay then? It has been said here that it was because Congress did not act quickly enough. I will tell you why they did not make them pay then. It was because the Treasury had written out a formula and the formula did not carry through. The companies did not owe the money. They did not have anybody to whom they could have lawfully paid the money. Besides, if they had tried at that time to pay any taxes, and if they had offered to pay taxes which were not taxes any policyholder could have enjoined them because they did not owe any taxes and they could not lawfully pay out company money for something that the company did not owe.

Let us just have the understanding that this is not a measure on which all the insurance companies are in harmony and have agreed to. A big segment of the companies do not favor this program.

Mr. Chairman, this proposed legislation comes in as the recommendation of a subcommittee of the Committee on Ways and Means. I do not want to burden you with any of my own philosophies, but I have never been in favor of subcommittees of the Committee on Ways and Means. I will show you why we ought not to have subcommittees of the Committee on Ways and Means, because everything that the Committee on Ways and Means does has a Nation-wide effect. The business of some committees is largely local. Public Works, for example. That committee ought to have a subcommittee to go out to Buffalo, for instance, to determine whether a bridge or a post-office building ought to be built there and of course three or four of the members could go out and get the facts and save the time and expense of having the full committee go. But everything that the Way and Means Committee does is of Nation-wide effect and has Nation-wide application and every member on the committee should study every subject before the committee for decision. Every member of that committee should be present when testimony is being taken and any definite decision is to be made. You could not have a finer chairman of a subcommittee anywhere in this world than the chairman of the subcommittee that handled the matter before us. There is no finer man in the House than the gentleman from New York [Mr. LYNCH], the chairman of this subcommittee. Nobody loves and respects him more than I do. But what did his subcommittee do? Three members were appointed from the Republican side, and I understand two of them were not able to attend very much. I do not know how many Democrats were present on the subcommittee. But let us look at the work of the subcommittee. Let us take this Resolution 371. This subcommittee came out with a big report and they recommended Resolution 371. But after the full committee came back, the subcommittee changed front and struck out all of Resolution 371 and gave us another with entirely different language in it.

Mr. FORAND. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield before he gets too far afield?

Mr. JENKINS. I am not far afield, but I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. FORAND. I think, in justice to your Republican colleagues on that committee, your statement should be corrected. You said two of them were never there.

Mr. JENKINS. I said I thought two of them were not able to be there much. If I am wrong I am willing to acknowledge it; I understand that they were away.

Mr. FORAND. Another point I think the gentleman should bear in mind is that he could have been a member of that subcommittee if he had not turned down the opportunity.

Mr. JENKINS. I am not objecting to that at all. For years I have objected to all subcommittees of the Ways and Means Committee, because they work out just like this. We do not work well that way. We work fine in the whole committee when we all work together, as a whole committee.

Mr. MICHENER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JENKINS. I yield.

Mr. MICHENER. The subcommittee acts simply as the agent of the full committee?

Mr. JENKINS. That is right.

Mr. MICHENER. Does not the full committee then pass on the matter before the committee report is made, and is it not the report of the full committee and not the report of the subcommittee that we are considering?

Mr. JENKINS. Certainly it is. That is academic. Everyone knows that. But let us just take a moment to see what is in this resolution that is before us.

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JENKINS. I yield.

Mr. REED of New York. I just wanted the record to be perfectly clear. The subcommittee on our side was never absent except one man whose brother died and he just could not come.

Mr. JENKINS. I am sorry if I have done an injustice to anybody.

Mr. REED of New York. I just wanted the record to show that no member of the subcommittee on the Republican side was absent for a minute except the one whose brother died.

Mr. JENKINS. I may be wrong but that is what I understood. But in any event, if you had all been there, if every member of the committee had been there and you brought out the resolution, why did you not stick to it? If your work had been so thorough, why, after the whole committee met, did you change it all around? Let us see how difficult it is to understand what the subcommittee did and even what the full committee did when they reported out this bill. Let me read you one section of the formula in this bill after all the changes were made. This is the way it reads:

(1) In general: Except as provided in paragraph (2), the figure shall be computed in accordance with the following formula: The ratio which a numerator comprised of the aggregate of the sums of (A) 2 percent of the reserves for deferred dividends, (B) interest paid, and (C) the product of (i) the mean of the adjusted reserves at the beginning and end of the taxable year and (ii) the reserve earnings rate bears to a denominator comprised of the aggregate of the excess of net incomes computed without any deduction for tax-free interest, over the adjustment for certain reserves provided in subsection (c).

That is the kind of language we are dealing with—the most complicated language you can think of, and we bring it and want it passed as a simple little stopgap. Now, my friends, you say this is just a stopgap. You say you are going to take it up again for final revision in this session of the Congress—we have only 2 or 3 months in this session—why make this a stopgap today, something that nobody understands and about one-third of the insurance companies do not want and object to? Why make a stopgap of this? Why do you not go back and take it up and do it right? I am going to move to recommit this bill at the proper time and send it back to the whole committee where we can consider it carefully. The subcommittee did not have any public hearings. There is no record of what any Congressman said before the subcommittee nor what any insurance company man said. How do you expect this House to act on this important matter with only the brief explanations that we make on this floor today? We should not be here with this bill today. Why do we not tax insurance companies just like we tax everybody else? Tax them on their earnings. These insurance companies can tell how much they have earned; they can tell what their surplus is; they can tell what tax they should have paid if there was any law in effect taxing them in 1947, 1948, and 1949. I will tell you this, the insurance companies escaped because the Treasury missed its guess; its formula wore out. The Treasury prepared a formula in 1942 that lasted for only 3 years. In 1947 it ran out. It lost its applicability. It was not continued. Why were they not smart enough in the meantime to come to the Ways and Means Committee and demand legislation that would correct the situation? It just simply ran out, and now we have the situation of insurance companies that did not owe a dime in 1947, did not owe a dime in 1948, legally, nor in 1949.

You say that they came in and wanted to pay. Very well. There are two principles of taxation that I do not like.

I do not like for our Government to hold out its hat and let people come and put in that hat just what they want to put in. That is not taxation. That is accepting charity. That kind of a system is not an incident of sovereignty. We are a great sovereign Nation; we can tax whomsoever we please and make them pay. But when a man does not owe legally it is not right for the Congress to accept taxes as a gift. It is not right to pass a law going back 2 or 3 years and make a company pay what it does not owe. You say we have done that previously; I do not know when we have done that. We have done this, we have gone back a year or two and reduced taxes, and we have gone back when there were some continuing contract or circumstances that joined the past with the present. But now you are going to adopt the principle of making people come in and pay when they do not owe and there is no continuing implied contractual agreements. You should not hold out your hat to them and say for them to come and pay what they want, that you will just estimate it at $90,000,000 and let them go free. If they owe money they owe and ought to pay and have the money with which to pay; if they do not owe they ought not to be taxed. That is my issue. I do not represent the insurance companies in any way. They talked to me like they did, I expect, to every other Congressman on the committee. Two or three years ago they said, "We ought to be paying." I know the general counsel of one of the biggest insurance companies. He said to me: "We ought to be paying." And he and I tried to fix up a piece of legislation, but we found it was not a very easy thing to do. A very serious legal proposition was involved and I gave it up.

Let me throw this out to you from the standpoint of practical politics: If you pass this bill today, which you are going to do, it goes right over to the other body and they will use it as a vehicle on which to attach the repeal of the excise taxes. That is a subject that, by the Constitution, belongs to the House of Representatives and ought to be taken up in the House of Representatives by the Committee on Ways and Means; but just as surely as this bill goes over to the other body they will take the tax program away from the House of Representatives. We ought not to permit that to happen. I do not want to do that. That is one of the principal reasons for my being opposed to the passage of this legislation.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Ohio has expired.

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Chairman, I yield five additional minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. JENKINS].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio is recognized for five additional minutes.

Mr. JENKINS. That is one reason why, just purely as a matter of political expediency and parliamentary preference, we should mind our own business and hold this thing within our own jurisdiction. Now, let me go along just a little further and speak about the new formula they propose in this bill.

In the first bill that the subcommittee reported they went back only to 1938. The subcommittee held no public hearings on the bill; they had no hearings at which all the insurance companies could come in; there are no printed hearings from which we can get enlightenment, and, as I started to say, we have not had anything like a complete digest of this whole program, and no explanation of this new formula that they provide. The first resolution recommended by the subcommittee only went back to 1948. This new formula goes back to 1947. One of the finest statements I heard anybody make on this matter was made by one of the experts who is sitting back there behind the chairman. He made a statement giving us the legal decisions with reference to this retroactivity program to tax people for years when they were not taxable. He said that he thought perhaps the decisions would support this program as far back as 1938, but he was very uncertain that it would hold for 1947; in fact he was inclined to be certain that it would not.

What is going to happen to this legislation if we pass it? In the first place, we feed it over to the other body and they will take the tax program away from us. In the second place, it is going to get into the courts; our great committee is going to feed it into the courts. That is all there is to it. If this bill is recommitted to the Ways and Means Committee we can avoid this disastrous course that the bill will take if it is passed. The Treasury has a fine corps of expert tax men. The Ways and Means Committee has the finest tax experts in the country. I know they can perfect a formula which will answer the purpose and will keep this legislation from the courts.

I am not going to be a party to sending this entire matter to the courts when there are about one-third of the insurance companies not satisfied with it. Also I do not want to surrender the right given us by the Constitution to handle taxes. I know our great chairman, every time anybody suggests that we send something over to the other body and let them perfect it, in his innate consciousness he rebels against the suggestion. Nobody wants to do that. I am sure I do not want to do it.

These are some of my reasons for opposing this legislation.

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JENKINS. I yield to the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. If an insurance company refused to pay this retroactive tax, that insurance company may take this matter into the court and knock out the law.

Mr. JENKINS. Yes, and I am confident that it will be in the courts as soon as it passes and enforcement is attempted against some of these insurance companies. Again I say I hope we send this resolution back to the Ways and Means Committee where I feel sure this whole matter may be adjusted satisfactorily.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CAMP].

Mr. CAMP. Mr. Chairman, at the outset I wish to express, as a member of the subcommittee which handled this legislation, my sincerest thanks for the diligence and the very competent manner in which our chairman, Judge LYNCH, of New York, conducted the conferences which led to the reporting of this bill. It has been said here that no public hearings were held but, in my humble opinion, the manner in which this matter was investigated is far superior to the holding of public hearings.

Our chairman invited all of the insurance companies to come to Washington, not for hearings but to sit around a conference table with the members of the subcommittee and discuss this subject. Much may be said for that manner of conducting legislative business especially tax matters.

A large proportion of the companies, practically every one of the big companies, had their men here, usually the vice president, treasurer, or general counsel. The whole subject of life insurance taxation was thoroughly discussed.

Here is what has happened: Instead of taxing a life-insurance company just as you do every other corporation in the land, the Congress and the Treasury Department have tried to provide a formula whereby their legal reserves may be perfectly supported and perfectly protected. All of us who know anything about life insurance appreciate that some life-insurance companies operate on a 2 percent legal reserve, or 2½ or 2¾ or 3, some up to 3½, which means that in figuring the premium to be collected from the policyholder they figure they will earn say 3½ percent, in the instances of companies that are on a 3½-percent reserve basis, on that premium and that 3½ percent will be credited to the reserve so that when the policy contract matures they will have sufficient money to pay it off. Congress tried to protect all these companies, many of them on different reserve bases. There had to be a formula.

Now, the formula which has been in effect previously was one which was suggested by the actuaries and counsel of the various companies, through their life-insurance association, to the Treasurer of the United States, and the Treasurer, after many conferences with them, agreed on that formula. It worked well for a few years, but in the case of Government bonds, in which many companies invest their money largely, the interest rates were lowered. Interest and advance charges have been lowered. Rates of interest paid on savings deposits have been lowered, so that we find in 1 year one little southern life-insurance company, with less than four-tenths of 1 percent of all the life insurance in force, was paying 30 percent of all the tax paid by all of the life-insurance companies. Now, anybody knows that is getting out of step. That is just about as far out of step as my good friend, whom I love very much, the gentleman from Ohio, when he says that of this committee, which is composed of 25 members, all are out of step except him.

Mr. JENKINS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CAMP. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. JENKINS. I do not think the gentleman will claim that all the members of the Committee on Ways and Means were ever together at any time on the discussion of this matter.

Mr. CAMP. Well, in the vote taken on the bill I would like to say that there was only one dissenting vote, and that was the vote of the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. JENKINS. That does not show that all other 24 members were there and voted.

Mr. CAMP. I do not know what the attendance that day was, but our committee has a pretty good attendance, you know.

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CAMP. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. REED of New York. Under the Reorganization Act you could not report it out unless a majority were there, anyhow.

Mr. CAMP. That is right.

Now, let me go further about this formula. These companies, as you know, all have experts known as actuaries. And, they are experts; they are among the most efficient experts in the world. American life insurance stands preeminent as one of the great businesses of the world, and American life insurance companies are the largest and the greatest. I am, as an American, proud of our life insurance companies, and we have confidence in them. Their actuaries said this formula will work. But, lo and behold, other matters over which they had no control, and none of us had any control, happened. The war came on. Billions of dollars in Government bonds were issued and interest rates were lowered all over the world. Then the formula did not work. In 1947 these same Treasury officials who had been meeting with them wrote to these companies and said, "Look here, under this old formula you are not going to pay any taxes at all this year. We must adjust the formula." Now, the reason that two years passed, 1947 and 1948, during which no taxes were paid was because these actuaries and these general counsel had never agreed to a new formula. Many conferences had been held. When our subcommittee, under the able leadership of Judge LYNCH, got together, and we called them before us, he said, as Uncle Remus said of his rabbit, "Now, gentlemen, we are 'obligeed' to climb a tree now. We have to tax our life insurance companies."

The gentleman in opposition has said that 25 percent of the life-insurance companies are opposed to this formula we have here today. Why over 95 of them were represented at the conference and agreed to it, and the only ones that are not in favor of this resolution and this stopgap formula are two or three companies who did not seem to want to agree to it because they did not want to pay the taxes. Let it be said to the credit of the life-insurance companies that this great industry walked into those conferences and said, "Yes, we should pay taxes and we are willing to pay them."

Mr. Chairman, when taxes are as high as they are in this country at this time, every last segment of our economy ought to pay its just and even share of them, and that goes for any competitive business. Not only should we enact this stopgap legislation affecting life-insurance companies but we should enact, at this session of Congress, other stopgap legislation which will impose an even and a just tax on every company and every corporation and every businessman in this land that is in business competition with somebody else who is paying taxes.

I say that this bill under consideration today is in line with the main thought in the President's tax message of the other day. Let us collect taxes evenly and justly as we go along.

Nobody contends that life-insurance companies are not in the most respected of all businesses, that of conserving estates so as to protect the dependents of the men and women of this country. Nobody wants to tax a life-insurance company any more than its just and proportionate share. The life-insurance business is one of the largest segments of American business economy. Its earnings are low but they are steady. If that segment is untaxed, there are many other segments of business which likewise would have the same right to be considered for less taxation.

In closing, Mr. Chairman, may I say that this subcommittee's work was one of the most pleasant I have ever had any part in. It was one of the most efficient jobs ever done by a subcommittee. As far as attendance was concerned, everybody who did not have some real, genuine reason for being absent was present at all of the meetings. A thorough investigation took place. Our subcommittee chairman, the gentleman from New York, Judge LYNCH, deserves very much credit for having done a very splendid job.

Mr. HALE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CAMP. I yield to the gentleman from Maine.

Mr. HALE. I do not think I ever saw a tax bill which provided for a retroactive tax. Do I understand that the gentleman bases the constitutionality of that on an agreement with the life-insurance companies? I did not quite understand what he was driving at.

Mr. CAMP. It is not uncommon to pass a tax bill providing for a tax on income of a previous year. There are many instances of that. Such legislation has been before the Supreme Court many times. In one instance one of the States taxed in 1 year the income of the previous year of certain corporations, and that act was held to be constitutional on the ground that during that year they had been in correspondence and in conference trying to reach an agreement as to what would be a just rate of taxation. This is the case of Walsh v. Henry (305 U. S. 134).

Mr. HALE. Here you have 2 years.

Mr. CAMP. We have 2 years, but as the committee report will show, the Treasury and the officials of the insurance companies have been in conference and making a steady effort all along to agree on the formula. Ninety-five percent of the life-insurance companies know that, and they all came in and agreed to it. If they take it to the Supreme Court, this committee has ample authority, and we have sound reason to believe that the Court will hold it constitutional, just as it has done in previous cases.

Mr. HINSHAW. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CAMP. I yield.

Mr. HINSHAW. I wish the gentleman would explain the language in the letter from the Secretary of the Treasury which was contained in the report on page 18, a little below the middle of the page.

Mr. CAMP. The gentleman will have to read it to me, because I do not have the report here.

Mr. HINSHAW. If the gentleman will permit, I will read it. It is a letter dated October 10, 1949, that was last fall, in which he says:

> Unless this legislation is enacted promptly, I am concerned that revenue from this industry may be irretrievably lost for 1948 and possibly also for 1949.

Does that mean that to have gone over into this fiscal year or calendar year that we probably have lost legally the revenue from 1948, which of course could be paid in 1949, and that this bill because it goes beyond that back to 1947, may not be held constitutional by the Supreme Court under the ex post facto rule?

Mr. CAMP. In my opinion that means, and I may point out we investigated that question thoroughly after receiving that letter, that it is legal and it will be collected and that the courts will uphold us in this legislation. With the advice and assistance of counsel, we have come to that conclusion.

Mr. HINSHAW. The gentleman is inclined to believe, however, is he not, that the question of the constitutionality of the act, if passed, will be taken to the Supreme Court?

Mr. CAMP. I understand from what the gentleman from Ohio said that one of the companies which never agrees to anything intends to take it up. But, of course, every law we have ever passed in the Congress has been carried up to the Supreme Court. When people do not want to pay taxes, they will fight until the last ditch.

Mr. HALE. Does not the gentleman agree certainly with the fact that although there was a steady flow of correspondence back and forth between certain life-insurance companies and the Treasury Department that would not be binding on any company which did not happen to be involved in the correspondence?

Mr. CAMP. The gentleman may not know it, but they have an association of life-insurance companies to which most all of the companies belong and it was through that association and its general counsel that the Treasury was doing its work.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Georgia has expired.

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SIMPSON].

Mr. SIMPSON of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, the record is quite clear at the moment, so I want to repeat the most important part of our consideration of this bill, which is that at no time did the life-insurance industry or any of the companies in the life-insurance industry in any respect violate any law that the Congress passed with respect to their liability for payment of income taxes. They have been meticulous, as a matter of fact, and have paid all the taxes for which they have been legally and properly liable.

The reason for this legislation is, as has been explained, that under the formula under which the tax liability on life-insurance companies was imposed, passed in 1942, there today is no liability upon the life-insurance companies for the payment of any income tax. That situation has existed since the year 1947. So that for 1947 and 1948 and doubtless for 1949, no life-insurance company in the United States, regardless of the amount of money it may have made on its investment, would owe money to the Federal Government in the form of income tax.

The owners of the great life-insurance companies are the people of the country. They are your neighbors and mine. In general, as expressed by their representatives before the subcommittee of the Committee on Ways and Means studying this problem, they recognize a public responsibility for the payment of some part of their earnings which arise from investments in the form of taxes to the Government. They express a willingness, yea, a desire, to pay their fair share of the cost of doing business in the United States.

At the same time, they were not rushing forward eager to accept any formula offered to them, nor were they rushing forward with the money in their hands, saying, "Take this money." But they were looking to the future, with an eye on the past, seeking to work out with the committee and with the Treasury some proper formula under which the life-insurance industry might be taxed for the years past and for the future. After well-conducted hearings, if I may be pardoned for making that statement, being a member of the subcommittee, after these well-conducted hearings we did reach an agreement which applied to liability for the years past, but which does not in itself constitute a formula for the future. It is that formula which has been reduced in the resolution now before us, that we on the committee call upon this body to adopt this afternoon.

Under that formula the life-insurance industry, to be distinguished from the individual companies, will be responsible for the payment of taxes in the aggregate of about $93,000,000. This represents a tax, not upon the premium that you or your neighbor might pay to the insurance company, not directly upon that, but upon investment income; that is, earnings that the life-insurance company secures as a result of investing funds from its reserves and elsewhere, in Government bonds and other proper legal investments in our country. A formula is applied to that investment, and the tax liability is determined. Every company within the industry pays on the basis of that formula, as applied to its earnings. It is interesting to note that with respect to the tax liability of life-insurance companies, they are considered as a unit, as a Nation-wide industry, and that no individual company is considered alone in determining its liability, based upon any formula. After a Nation-wide percentage liability has been determined, that applies to every company within the industry, and a tax is levied on the basis of our usual corporate income-tax laws. It is unlike the average corporation within your district, which is considered individually and as a unit. Frankly, I do not know that I approve of this Nation-wide approach. I have been advised that the insurance industry prefer the Nation-wide approach rather than the individual-company approach, but it does seem to me that when this Congress, through its appropriate committee, considers this type of legislation for the future, we should examine carefully into the wisdom and advisability of continuing to tax life-insurance companies on a Nation-wide-industry basis rather than considering each company upon its own individual status.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIMPSON of Pennsylvania. I yield.

Mr. JOHNSON. The question I would like to have you explain is, If this is in the nature of an income tax that has not been paid, why did not the statute that applies to corporations apply to these companies?

Mr. SIMPSON of Pennsylvania. Because they were excepted from the general income tax laws. Special sections were drawn and passed to apply to life insurance companies.

Mr. JOHNSON. Is that what this statute is?

Mr. SIMPSON of Pennsylvania. This applies to the life insurance industry. Under the formula, which is still the law, there is no tax liability imposed upon these companies. Our purpose is to adopt a new formula, a new plan, by which the tax liability will occur upon life insurance companies for 1947, 1948, and 1949.

Mr. JOHNSON. That is based on the net income that they made from their investments?

Mr. SIMPSON of Pennsylvania. Yes, what amounts to the net income from their investments. This is arrived at after taking their earnings from their investments and deducting their expenses and applying certain other criteria that I cannot go into now.

Mr. JENKINS. I would remind the gentleman from California that if this law should be supported by the Supreme Court there would be no reason in the world why the Treasury and Congress could not pass retroactive tax laws on any corporation at any time.

Mr. SIMPSON of Pennsylvania. There is quite a distinction in this instance, the distinction being that back in 1947 when it became apparent that under the formula there would not be any liability on life-insurance companies, they were notified by the Treasury Department that efforts would be made to change that formula; so the insurance companies, or the insurance industry, was put upon notice that the Congress recognized that that great industry would be and should be responsible for the payment of some taxes for the years 1947, 1948, and 1949. Throughout those very same years the Treasury has been working with the insurance industry, and today we are considering the culmination of their efforts.

Mr. HALE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIMPSON of Pennsylvania. I yield.

Mr. HALE. Have the courts ever passed on the constitutionality of taxing life-insurance companies on a different basis than other corporations?

Mr. SIMPSON of Pennsylvania. I cannot answer that.

Mr. LYNCH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIMPSON of Pennsylvania. I yield.

Mr. LYNCH. They are not taxed on a different basis than other corporations. The whole question involved is: What is their taxable income? The rates are the same as for other corporations. The thing that we must be very careful about is not to include as taxable that part of their income which is necessary to meet the commitments made under their policies, and that is where the difficulty comes. It is not a question as to the rate of tax; the question is, What is their taxable income?

Mr. REED of New York. The gentleman is quite right. Because of the technicalities of the life-insurance business a formula is needed to arrive at their net income. Once the net income is determined it is taxed at 38 percent like the income of other corporations.

Mr. SIMPSON of Pennsylvania. I believe this legislation is highly desirable, and I call upon the members of this body to give it their support.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. COMBS].

Mr. COMBS. Mr. Chairman, normally I am opposed to any sort of retroactive law. In this particular instance I think it is entirely proper, and I want to briefly express the reasons why I think that is so.

Like the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. JENKINS], I was not a member of the subcommittee, but because this retroactive feature was in it, I immediately took note of it when it came before the full committee, and I read the report with some care. Let us see just briefly what the facts are.

In the first place, as to the method of taxing insurance companies: The money derived by life-insurance companies from the premiums assessed against policyholders all goes into the reserves with which to meet the obligations of policies as they mature. But, that forms a trust fund which is invested, maybe in real-estate loans, maybe in bonds, or otherwise, and the income thus derived from the trust fund is the income you deal with in assessing the income tax. But even a portion of that income is set aside to add to reserves.

All right. Now, the law of 1942 was set up out of necessity of supplying a yardstick of taking this income from investment, and so on, and determining what goes to reserves, and what remains as a profit that is taxable. What happened? That formula, by 1947, because of changes in the economic picture that I will not take the time to try to discuss, reached the point where it would result in the insurance companies paying no income tax, not because they had not made any earnings but because the formula set up for determining taxable earnings would no longer work.

This is what happened. This is why the retroactive feature of the law is all right. When the situation became evident in 1947 the Treasury called the insurance companies' attention to it. The Treasury began a study to see what could be done and made a report in February 1948.

Here is what happened, and I refer you to page 6 of the report of our committee. Certain insurance-company executives came up here and conferred with Secretary Snyder. A meeting was held on February 19, 1948, between him, Mr. Wiggins, Under Secretary, and some of these insurance-company executives. At a subsequent meeting held on February 25, 1948, those officials requested that the Treasury defer the publication of the study. Why? In order that the industry might have a chance to study the results and to confer further in regard thereto. Then we find that later the Secretary of the Treasury recommended to the Committee on Ways and Means that something be done about several matters of this nature, and recommendation No. 11 reads:

11. Income of life-insurance companies. It is recommended that the present method of computing the taxable income of life-insurance companies under sections 201, 202, and 203 of the code be revised so as to more clearly and equitably reflect the taxable income of such companies. A detailed proposal for carrying this recommendation into effect is now in course of preparation.

What happened then? I am quoting now from the report:

Your committee considered the above list of items as well as other matters, in executive session in May of that year, and item 11—was withdrawn in view of the request which had been made by the executives of the life-insurance companies for further time in which to study the Department's views.

Which is the insurance tax feature quoted above—

Now, they came in and made that study and now for the first time after the study the Committee on Ways and Means has opportunity to bring a bill of this nature before the Congress. So the delay was not occasioned by any failure on the part of the Secretary of the Treasury or the committee or the Congress, but in deference to the life-insurance companies. Certainly, they cannot come in now, having been notified to retain their reserves, that something like this would be brought in and say, "You are going back retroactively and taking in the reserves." They have been on notice all the time.

Mr. HINSHAW. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COMBS. I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. HINSHAW. I think the explanation the gentleman has given may hold up in the courts, as he suggests. May I ask the gentleman this question, in order to enlighten me and perhaps other Members of the House? There are both stock companies and mutual companies. I take it that this legislation applies only to the stock companies and not to the mutual companies.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield four additional minutes to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. COMBS. It applies to all life-insurance companies.

Mr. HINSHAW. How can the mutual company be said to have made earnings when it has no reserves?

Mr. COMBS. I do not want to go into a discussion of life insurance. I do not pose as an expert on that question. This is the point, however: The profits the mutual companies make go back to the policyholders instead of to formal stockholders. That is about the only difference. They do make net income which ought to be taxed.

Mr. HINSHAW. Is not that to be considered an excess payment?

Mr. COMBS. I do not care what it is considered; they make profits.

Mr. FORAND. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COMBS. I yield to the gentleman from Rhode Island.

Mr. FORAND. The point I wanted to make when the gentleman was talking about the dickering between the insurance companies and the Treasury is, the truth of the matter is, that the insurance companies were dickering with the Treasury on the formula that they themselves had suggested and that was accepted by the Congress in 1942.

Mr. COMBS. That is correct.

Mr. FORAND. The record will prove that the Treasury Department had its own formula that it was proposing, which the Treasury thought at that time was the better of the two formulas. However, because the life-insurance industry was unanimous in demanding this particular formula that now is the law, the Treasury said they would have no objection to it. So what we are actually doing is correcting, with the consent of the insurance companies, a mistake that the insurance companies and not the Treasury Department made back in 1942.

Mr. COMBS. Certainly that is true. I join others in saying that the insurance companies by and large have done a fine job. I think the subcommittee that handled this bill did a fine job, the members of both parties. I think this is a sound measure. The only question that could be raised about the validity of this levy would be as to the third year back there, 1947. I think it will stand up all right. But in any case, the longer we wait for this legislation, the more risk we run, depending on how far back we go in recovering back taxes. Going back 2 years has already been sustained by the courts.

It is in a little different category than other forms of legislation.

Mr. McDONOUGH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COMBS. I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. McDONOUGH. Did the testimony indicate that if the insurance companies pay this retroactive tax back to 1947 it will not have an effect upon the value of the premiums and the investments of the policyholders?

Mr. COMBS. I was not a member of the subcommittee, but my understanding is that it will not endanger in any way the investments. What about that, Mr. Chairman?

Mr. LYNCH. That is correct.

Mr. COMBS. The chairman of the subcommittee says that is correct, that it will not in any way endanger the policies.

Mr. McDONOUGH. I do not mean endanger them, but will it reduce their holdings? Will it reduce the percentage paid on the investment?

Mr. LYNCH. The information that we had on that score from the representatives of all the companies was to the contrary, that it would have no effect on the value of their policies.

Mr. McDONOUGH. Was any consideration given in the committee to making the tax apply for this taxable year for the whole amount that was due, instead of making it retroactive?

Mr. LYNCH. Yes; we considered that, and we felt that that probably would not be good for the industry and probably would not be good for us in trying to get the money that we thought should come in, for it would put too much of a burden, so we thought, and so the industry thought, on 1950.

Mr. COMBS. The life-insurance companies want good will. They realize the necessity for it and they do not want to be put in the class of tax dodgers and would like to pay their taxes for these 3 years.

Mr. McDONOUGH. Did the committee give any consideration to the establishment of a precedent in retroactive tax collection?

Mr. LYNCH. Yes; and we do not think there is any precedent established in this case.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. EBERHARTER].

Mr. EBERHARTER. Mr. Chairman, I was rather surprised by the remarks of the gentleman from Minnesota, my good friend [Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN]. I was not a member of the subcommittee handling this particular problem, but I am reliably informed, as has been said here by the chairman of the subcommittee in his opening remarks in the debate, that 95 percent of the insurance industry are satisfied with this legislation and that there is practically only one insurance company that is not.

Furthermore, that every insurance company with whom they came in contact, and they had lengthy consultations and conferences and meetings with representatives of the two great life-insurance associations of the country, agreed that they should pay taxes. Every insurance company in those associations agreed. I am surprised that the gentleman from Minnesota would stand up in the well of the House and perhaps put a fear in the heart of many policyholders throughout the country that this action by the Congress of the United States might endanger the payment of their policies because that is not true at all. The insurance companies certainly have enough intelligence and enough good representatives to present to the committee any objections they would have. I am certain every insurance company would champion the protection of its policyholders. I just want the committee to know that, Mr. Chairman, and I want the committee to know furthermore that the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN] is presenting an argument that even the representatives of the insurance companies never advanced for one moment. So I hope the policyholders of the country will have no fear that this will have any effect on their policy.

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. EBERHARTER. I yield.

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. Since the gentleman mentioned my name I have asked him to yield for this observation. Of course I said in my remarks I felt the insurance companies should pay taxes provided they kept up the reserves required by law. But there must be somebody here at least, and I am sure the gentleman agrees with me, who will look out for the interests of the 78,000,000 policyholders in the country.

Mr. EBERHARTER. That is just my point. Does not the gentleman think the insurance companies themselves would have made representations if there was any possibility of any effect whatsoever on the reserves? Certainly they would have, because we have to give the great insurance companies of the United States credit for wanting to protect the policyholders.

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. I think they should, but it is our duty here in Congress when we have legislation of this kind before us to also protect the life insurance policyholders of the country who are depending upon the trusts that they have created to protect their dependents.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 15 minutes.

STOPGAP LEGISLATION FOR LIFE-INSURANCE COMPANIES

Mr. Chairman, I introduced House Joint Resolution 371 on October 10, 1949, in order to terminate the exemption of life-insurance companies under the corporate income tax. Under the resolution as introduced eight percent of the net investment income of each company would have been treated as its taxable income in 1948 and 1949. This would have produced $90,000,000 additional revenue for the 2 years combined.

Immediate action seemed essential because the exemption of this large and profitable industry was the unanticipated result of a formula for determining the taxable income of life-insurance companies adopted in 1942. This formula, which at the time of its adoption had the support of both the Treasury Department and the representatives of the life-insurance companies, defined taxable income as the excess of the revenues received from the companies' investments over the presumed requirements of their policyholders' reserves. The net income so defined, was subject to the same rates of tax as other corporations.

The 1942 formula was peculiar in two respects. First, the percentage of investment income which was taxable was the same for every firm in the industry. Second, the taxable percentage was fixed largely on the assumption that the policyholders' reserves required a return of 3¼ percent. To a lesser extent the percentage was determined on the basis of the actual average contributions to policyholders' reserves in the industry during the preceding year.

As a result of the 1942 legislation the tax paid by life-insurance companies increased from $1,190,000 in 1941 to $27,427,000 in 1942. There was a further increase to $34,482,000 in 1943, but thereafter the tax paid declined steadily. In 1947 and 1948 no tax was due at all and, I have been informed, probably no tax will be due in 1949. This was the result of the combination of a declining yield on insurance-company investments and the use of a formula based primarily on the assumption that policyholders' reserves required a return of 3¼ percent per year. In spite of the continued increase in the amount of the industry's investment income, the resulting overstatement of the proportion needed to finance the contributions required by policyholders' reserves gradually reduced and finally eliminated the taxable income of the life-insurance companies.

This is an important and profitable industry. It is not right that it should go untaxed, especially when the country as a whole is bearing an unusually severe burden of taxation.

The inequity of the exemption of the industry was apparent immediately and notice was given in 1947 by the Secretary of the Treasury that a revision of the formula used to define the net income of life-insurance companies was in order. This proved to be a very difficult and time-consuming task. In developing a new formula the Treasury consulted with representatives of the industry. A diversity of views appeared and the resulting discussions lasted from the autumn of 1947 until the summer of 1949. No generally satisfactory answer having been developed up to that time, the Treasury Department and the staff of the Joint Committee on Internal Revenue Taxation recommended the enactment of stopgap legislation to terminate this unpremeditated tax exemption pending a final solution to the problem. The Secretary of the Treasury suggested temporary legislation in a letter to me dated August 16, 1949. Opposition on the part of some companies to the proposal contained in his letter produced further delay, but on October 10, 1949, the Secretary wrote me a second letter confirming his previous recommendations. On the same day I introduced House Joint Resolution 371.

Objections to the resolution were raised by the representatives of a number of the companies. Some believed that the decision to tax 8 percent of investment income was arbitrary and wished to substitute a percentage related either to the experience of the industry as a whole, or the experience of the individual company. Others objected to the imposition of a tax on income received in 1948, arguing that retroactive taxation was unfair.

These objections led to the appointment on October 12 of the subcommittee whose report, entitled "The Income Taxation of Life-Insurance Companies," was recently made public. Under the able chairmanship of the gentleman from New York, the Honorable WALTER A. LYNCH, this subcommittee held a number of meetings with representatives of the industry in general and of the particular companies which had taken exception to the resolution. The subcommittee concluded that immediate stopgap legislation was in order, but believed that it should differ somewhat from House Joint Resolution 371 as originally introduced. There were two principal differences between the original resolution and the subcommittee's proposal. First, instead of taxing a flat 8 percent of net investment income, the taxable percentage would be determined by reference to the average experience of the industry in the preceding year. Second, in addition to imposing a tax based on income received in 1948 and 1949, there was to be levied also a tax based on income received in 1947, the year in which the 1942 formula ran out and in which discussions concerning the revision of this feature of the income-tax law were begun.

The amendments of House Joint Resolution 371 proposed by the subcommittee had the support of the vast majority of the life-insurance companies. Because a tax would be imposed for each of the years in which the 1942 formula had produced no tax liability, the industry would be relieved of a certain amount of embarrassment and bad public relations resulting from its tax-free status. The fact that net income for tax purposes was to be defined in terms of the average experience of the industry was attractive to a great majority of the companies which had long advocated this approach as the basis for a long-run solution.

From the point of view of the Government the amended version of House Joint Resolution 371 is acceptable because it is expected to produce about the same, or possibly a little more, revenue than the resolution originally introduced, and because much of the controversy which the original resolution might have produced will be avoided. This is desirable because the proposed legislation is of a stopgap character and quick action is essential. Moreover, the form which this resolution takes in no way sets the pattern for the permanent method of defining the taxable income of life-insurance companies which is to follow.

In accordance with its status as stopgap legislation, the amended resolution applies only to the years 1947, 1948, and 1949. It is hoped that during the current session of Congress the Committee on Ways and Means will be able to bring forward a satisfactory permanent solution. Should this prove impossible, it will be necessary to introduce, at a later date, a second resolution extending to 1950 the formula used in the amended version of House Joint Resolution 371 or establishing some other basis for a 1950 tax. It is my sincere hope that this will not be necessary. I have every expectation that the work done by the Treasury and by our own staff is sufficiently well advanced so that a permanent solution can be brought forward in a comparatively short time.

Representatives of certain companies have taken strong exception to the retroactive aspect of the resolution. I do not believe that their arguments are well founded. From the beginning, the industry has been fully aware that its exemption from the income tax could not be justified on grounds of equity, particularly when the tax burdens borne by others were so severe. Moreover, representatives of the industry have been discussing the problems arising out of the failure of the 1942 formula ever since the autumn of 1947, and they were warned at that time that the revised formula might be applied to the year 1947. It seems to me that the equity of the case is all in favor of the retroactive feature of the proposed resolution.

The constitutionality of the resolution also seems clear. A considerable number of our income tax laws have been given retroactive application, and in no case has this resulted in their being held unconstitutional. We have before us also the decision of the United States Supreme Court in Welch v. Henry (305

U. S. 134), dated November 21, 1938, the opinion being written by Mr. Justice Stone. Here the Supreme Court upheld an income tax imposed by the State of Wisconsin in 1935 upon dividends received in 1933 which had previously been exempt. The Court stated:

A tax is not necessarily unconstitutional because retroactive. * * * Taxation is neither a penalty imposed on the taxpayer nor a liability which he assumes by contract. It is but a way of apportioning the cost of government among those who in some measure are privileged to enjoy its benefits and must bear its burdens. Since no citizen enjoys immunity from that burden, its retroactive imposition does not necessarily infringe due process, and to challenge the present tax it is not enough to point out that the taxable event, the receipt of income, antedated the statute.

Representatives of certain other companies have taken exception to the fact that the percentage of investment income which is taxable under the resolution is determined on the basis of the average experience of the industry rather than that of the individual taxpayer. This objection raises a difficult and basic question of policy and the request has been made that hearings be conducted on the resolution in order to permit a thorough exploration of the question at issue. No such hearings have been held because, as I have pointed out repeatedly, this is merely stopgap legislation applying to a period already past; a tax constructed in accordance with a principle embodied in existing legislation. You may be assured that when the Committee on Ways and Means considers permanent legislation it will explore thoroughly the desirability of substituting a tax based upon the experience of the individual firm for the industry average approach. You may be assured also that the committee will review the question whether investment income alone is the appropriate tax base for life-insurance companies and will investigate thoroughly the possibility of imposing the tax on a broader base. For that purpose public hearings will be very much in order. However, time does not permit and logic does not require such hearings for the purposes of the resolution now before you, which is stopgap legislation only and which applies the principles contained in existing law to taxable years that are already closed.

I urge the immediate adoption of the amended version of House Joint Resolution 371 because I believe that it will eliminate an unforeseen and unjustifiable series of tax exemptions, because it will bring in $93,000,000, or more, of additional tax revenue at a time when it is sorely needed, and because it will provide the Committee on Ways and Means with a breathing spell during which it may consider carefully the appropriate long-run solution to the problem of defining the taxable income of life-insurance companies.

The CHAIRMAN. If there are no further requests for time, the Clerk will read the resolution for amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, etc., That section 202 (b) and section 203 (b) of the Internal Revenue Code (relating to the reserve and other policy liability credit of life-insurance companies) are hereby amended by adding at the end of each the following new sentence: "Notwithstanding any other provision of this subsection, the figure to be used in computing the reserve and other policy liability credit for taxable years beginning in 1948 and 1949 shall be 0.92."

SEC. 2. Every life-insurance company subject to the taxes imposed by section 201 of the Internal Revenue Code shall, after the date of the enactment of this joint resolution and on or before the 15th day of the third month following the close of the month in which falls the date of such enactment, make a return for its taxable year beginning in 1948 with respect to the taxes imposed by such section 201 (determined with the amendments made by the first section of this joint resolution). The return required by this section shall constitute the return for such taxable year for all purposes of the Internal Revenue Code; and no return for such taxable year, with respect to the taxes imposed by section 201 of such code, filed on or before the date of the enactment of this joint resolution shall be considered for any of such purposes as a return for such year. The taxes imposed by section 201 of such code for such taxable year (determined with the amendments made by the first section of this joint resolution) shall be paid on the 15th day of the third month following the close of the month in which falls the date of the enactment of this joint resolution, in lieu of at the time prescribed in section 56 (a) of such code. All payments with respect to the taxes of such taxable year imposed by section 201 of such code under the law in effect prior to the enactment of this joint resolution, to the extent that such payments have not been credited or refunded, shall be deemed to be payments on account of such taxes determined with the amendments made by the first section of this joint resolution.

With the following committee amendment:

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert the following: "That (a) the second sentence of section 202 (b) of the Internal Revenue Code is hereby amended to read as follows: 'This figure shall be based on such data with respect to life-insurance companies for the preceding taxable year as the Secretary considers representative and shall be computed as follows:

"'(1) In general: Except as provided in paragraph (2), the figure shall be computed in accordance with the following formula: The ratio which a numerator comprised of the aggregate of the sums of (A) 2 percent of the reserves for deferred dividends, (B) interest paid, and (C) the product of (i) the mean of the adjusted reserves at the beginning and end of the taxable year and (ii) the reserve earnings rate bears to a denominator comprised of the aggregate of the excess of net incomes computed without any deduction for tax-free interest, over the adjustment for certain reserves provided in subsection (c).

"'(2) Special rule for 1947, 1948, and 1949: In the case of the taxes imposed for a taxable year beginning in 1947, 1948, or 1949, the figure to be used for such year shall be computed as provided in paragraph (1) except that—

"'(A) in computing the product required under clause (C) of paragraph (1), there shall be used, in lieu of the reserve earnings rate, the average rate of interest assumed in computing life-insurance reserves. Such average rate shall be calculated in the manner provided in the second sentence of section 201 (c) (4); and

"'(B) if the Secretary, in computing the ratio, finds that the net effect of including the data with respect to any life-insurance company is to increase the numerator more than it increases the denominator, he shall limit the net change in the numerator resulting from such inclusion to the net change in the denominator resulting therefrom.'

"(b) Section 203 (b) of the Internal Revenue Code is hereby amended by striking out 'figure' and inserting in lieu thereof 'applicable figure.'

"(c) The amendments made by this joint resolution shall be applicable to taxable years beginning after December 31, 1946. The Secretary of the Treasury shall, within 60 days after the date of the enactment of this joint resolution, determine and proclaim in accordance with the provisions of section 202 (b) of the Internal Revenue Code, as amended by this joint resolution, the figures to be used by life-insurance companies in computing their reserve and other policy liability credits for taxable years beginning in 1947, 1948, and 1949.

"SEC. 2. Every life-insurance company subject to the taxes imposed by section 201 of the Internal Revenue Code shall, after the date of the Secretary's proclamation required by section 1 (c) of this joint resolution and on or before the 15th day of the third month following the close of the month in which this joint resolution is enacted, make returns for its taxable years beginning in 1947, 1948, and 1949 with respect to the taxes imposed by such section 201 (determined with the amendments made by the first section of this joint resolution). The return required by this section for any taxable year shall constitute the return for such taxable year for all purposes of the Internal Revenue Code; and no return for such taxable year, with respect to the taxes imposed by section 201 of such code, filed on or before the date of such proclamation shall be considered for any of such purposes as a return for such year. The taxes imposed by section 201 of such code (determined with the amendments made by the first section of this joint resolution) for each such taxable year shall be paid on the 15th day of the third month following the close of the month in which this joint resolution is enacted, in lieu of at the time prescribed in section 56 (a) of such code. All payments with respect to the taxes for each such taxable year imposed by section 201 of such code under the law in effect prior to the enactment of this joint resolution, to the extent that such payments have not been credited or refunded, shall be deemed to be payments made at the time of the filing of the return required by this section on account of the taxes for that year determined with the amendments made by the first section of this joint resolution."

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order against the amendment on the ground that it is not germane to the pending bill. If the gentleman desires, I will reserve it for the time being.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. I would appreciate the gentleman doing so.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the point of order.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I would like to submit a unanimous-consent request. This amendment repeals the wartime excise-tax rates on such articles as furs, jewelry, luggage, toilet preparations, lubrication oils, gasoline, tires and tubes, automobile trucks and busses, automobiles and motorcycles, parts and accessories, electrical energy, electric, gas, and oil appliances, light bulbs and tubes, radio sets and phonographs, phonograph records, musical instruments, mechanical refrigerators, air conditioners, matches, business and store machines, photographic apparatus and sporting goods, and so forth. I ask that the amendment be considered as read.

I have introduced this amendment to give the House an opportunity to vote now on repeal of the wartime excise taxes which are stifling business and costing people jobs. The House Ways and Means Committee has acted with amazing speed to bring to the floor so quickly this bill to carry out President Truman's proposal of January 23, involving increased income taxes of insurance companies.

However, the President also, in that very same message, asked for reductions in certain wartime excise taxes, in a sort of latter-day confession that perhaps those of us who had been demanding action for one long year were right after all. It occurs to me that would be both proper and fitting, in view of the speed with which this bill has been brought to the floor of the House, if we adopted as an amendment my proposal to repeal the wartime excise taxes immediately.

This amendment repeals the wartime rates on such items as jewelry, electric-light bulbs and tubes, luggage, including women's handbags; furs, admissions, toilet goods, including such essentials as baby oils; cable, radio, and telegraph messages; telephone tolls and local telephone bills; transportation of persons and of freight; cameras and photographic equipment. It exempts barber shops and beauty parlors from any tax on toilet articles. It repeals the manufacturers' excise tax on electric, gas, and oil appliances, including stoves; the tax on musical instruments, business and store machines; and it reduces the tax on safe-deposit boxes.

Certainly my colleagues on the Democratic side of the aisle could have no objection to carrying out this part of the President's revised program if they have no objection to considering the bill now before us.

I realize that there are certain inconsistencies which confront them. The President is committed to increases in taxes, not decreases. The bill before the House increases taxes, and therefore I can understand the reasons for the haste in rushing it to the floor. My amendment would reduce taxes, which might explain the fact that there is no hurry on the part of the administration to have it reported to the House.

My measure to return excise taxes to their prewar levels was introduced on February 2, 1949, and I might add that it has been bottled up in the Ways and Means Committee by the administration ever since. These wartime rates were specifically designed to retard sales. Any businessman affected by these taxes will tell you that they are retarding sales, losing the Federal Treasury revenue, and causing employers who have no desire to do so to lay off workers. I am certain that the President, who is already responsible for 1 year of delay, would not wish, if he thought about it, to be responsible for further delay, further loss of jobs and further harm to business.

These wartime excise taxes have reached the point of diminishing returns. At this very minute, small-business men, operators of small stores, and other businesses will tell you that since the President's message, the American public has stopped buying goods upon which these excise taxes are still levied. There is sound reason to believe that if these burdensome taxes were repealed, sales of the taxed commodities would promptly soar and that the revenue from both personal and corporate sources would increase in amount sufficient to offset the reduction in excise revenue. Therefore, I urge the Members of the House, both Democrats and Republicans alike, to support this amendment today so that we can remove this needless burden from the back of the American economy. I cannot believe that the Democratic leadership of this House would care to share with President Truman the responsibility of further postponement of this vital step to which millions upon millions of Americans subscribe. Here is a test of good faith, and we on the minority side of the aisle do not intend to let the American people down.

Mr. Chairman, some do not appreciate the failure to eliminate these taxes are contributing to a slump in business. Stores are selling less. Stocks are accumulating. People are waiting for Congress to give this long-wanted relief. This causes fewer orders to the factories and contributes to curtailments and unemployment.

You say people are not refusing to buy. Let me give you the facts.

In December 1949 there was a slump in revenue from the manufacturers' sales taxes of 15.7 percent over the sales of December 1948. The retail excise taxes were off 18.8 percent in December 1949 over the previous year.

That is a serious decline. It means, if continued, a loss of revenue of $450,000,000. And I am afraid January figures will be worse.

The Treasurer's report, which will be out in a day or two, which has just been compiled by the Treasury Department, shows that furs, for illustration, brought in revenue of $9,875,698.34 in December 1948 and this year only $6,737,983.88. That is a terrific decline.

Jewelry revenues declined from $19,245,000 to $15,964,000.

Every item that bears an excise tax or a retail tax has decreased, with the single exception of automobiles which show the only increase.

I believe, from these facts, we should pass these excise-tax reductions today.

I ask for this legislation not only in the interest of the concerns that are engaged in these various activities, but I ask it above all in the interest of the people who work, the people who are finding that their employment is gone, finding that they are out of jobs. The loss to the country works two ways: Not only do we have a loss of income from the failure of the goods to flow but also, through putting people out of work in the shops, we are crowding the unemployment rolls. This means the Government is obliged to pay many millions of dollars to the unemployed workers. I predict the passage of this amendment would mean a financial gain to the country.

I sincerely hope the distinguished gentleman from Tennessee will not press his point of order. Democrats and Republicans alike have voiced their approval of this legislation. I ask for its passage so that the economic conditions of this country will not become worse than they are today.

Mr. JENKINS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. JENKINS. If the Republicans had been elected to power in 1948, this would have been done long before this.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. It was part of our program. We expected this to be tax reduction bill No. 2, the first is already a law, passed over the veto of the President.

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. I yield to the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. The gentleman's proposal is in the interest of the consumers of the United States, who are now paying for the high cost of Government through these taxes on the goods they buy.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. That is absolutely correct. This amendment will help bring about lower prices. Let me illustrate how transportation taxes enter into living costs. On a carload of fruit shipped from California to New York City, over $24 in taxes is paid on the freight charges alone. These charges are an important factor in high prices.

Mr. FORAND. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. I yield to the gentleman from Rhode Island.

Mr. FORAND. I cannot let go unchallenged the statement just made by the gentleman from Ohio, that if the Republicans were in control this would have been out of the way, because after all it was the Republican Party that struck from the tax code the termination date on these excise taxes.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. I did not want to get into a partisan argument here, but the gentleman knows well that action was approved by the President of the United States.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts has expired.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for three additional minutes.

Mr. COOPER. Further reserving the point of order, Mr. Chairman, may I say that I have no objection to this extension of time.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

Mr. CANFIELD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. I yield to the gentleman from New Jersey.

Mr. CANFIELD. When did the distinguished minority leader first introduce his bill to repeal these taxes?

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. I introduced it last February or March.

Mr. CHURCH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. CHURCH. Does the gentleman's proposal include photographic businesses?

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. They are in this list for relief if the amendment is agreed to.

Mr. CHURCH. Those businesses were required during the war to convert to the munitions business.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. May I say these taxes in the first instance were not proposed as revenue measures. They were to discourage travel on the railroads; they were to discourage people from talking too much on the telephone; they were to discourage people from going into industries where the demand for goods was not fully in accord with the war effort. That is the main reason these taxes were imposed. The war is over now, and we should put the people back on a peacetime basis as far as excise taxes are concerned.

Mr. McDONOUGH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. McDONOUGH. They were certainly not imposed for the purpose of not having more babies, but baby oil was included in the items taxed.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. I do not know how that particular item got in there. I would not be too familiar with that.

Mr. McDONOUGH. I am.

Mr. EBERHARTER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. EBERHARTER. Does not the gentleman know that there was a termination date for the levying of these excise taxes, and that when the gentleman from Massachusetts was Speaker the Republican Congress wiped out that termination date and made these taxes apply for an indefinite period?

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. I could answer that quite easily, but I will yield to the able and distinguished top expert, the gentleman from New York [Mr. REED] to answer.

Mr. EBERHARTER. That is the fact, I will say to the gentleman.

Mr. REED of New York. I am very happy to answer the gentleman's question. The President of the United States not only sent the bill up to the Committee on Ways and Means, but in his acceptance message he urged that we do away with this termination date because he said that with the slowing up of business we could not afford to lower the revenue, and the Republican Party, cooperating with him, did away with the termination date.

Mr. EBERHARTER. Does the gentleman mean to say that the Republican Congress listened to President Truman?

Mr. REED of New York. Therefore the responsibility is on the administration. It has been on the administration and that is where it has remained.

Mr. EBERHARTER. The gentleman means that the Republican Party, having the majority, certainly wanted to do away with the termination date.

Mr. REED of New York. If the gentleman from Pennsylvania will check, he will find that there were only 356 Members in the House against the proposition, so you probably voted for it.

Mr. EBERHARTER. May I say to the gentlemen, to keep the record straight, that I did not. I voted to sustain the President's veto when he vetoed that message. So the responsibility must rest on the leadership of the Republican Party, and I think they ought to assume that responsibility.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. May I say to the gentleman from Pennsylvania that bill was probably passed at a time when we had more confidence in the President and his intentions than we do at the present time. We wanted to make certain our first tax bill did not hurt the revenues of the country.

The bill gave full tax relief to 7,000,000 small-tax payers; it aided the aged people and it gave every taxpayer a percentage of relief. It gave the country an impetus which brought about the first balanced budget in 18 years and at the same time an era of great prosperity.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts has expired.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Chairman, further reserving the point of order, I want to make a very brief statement. The memory of the gentleman on the other side is exceedingly short. The gentleman from Massachusetts, of course, never having been a member of the Committee on Ways and Means, cannot be expected to know much about the history of the excise-tax legislation. But the memory of the distinguished gentleman from New York, the ranking minority member, and others who have given similar expressions, is so exceedingly short on this question that I must try to make a few brief remarks to set the record straight. The fact is that the President of the United States sent his message to the Congress at the beginning of the Eightieth Republican-controlled Congress, recommending a 1-year extension of the existing excise taxes. The Republican-controlled Eightieth Congress disregarded the recommendation of the President of the United States, declined to follow that recommendation, and struck out the termination date for excise taxes which was then in existing law. So their action made these taxes permanent, and they have continued until now. Of course, that is the fact of the case and everybody at all familiar with the record knows that that is true.

With respect to the remarks made by some gentlemen that these taxes were never imposed for revenue purposes, again their memories are very short and they are very much in error. When these excise-tax increases were considered for war purposes, all of them, with the exception of a few, were imposed solely and only for revenue purposes. During that consideration, Mr. Leon Henderson, who was then head of OPA, recommended about 8 or 10 excise taxes to curtail civilian consumption, and the committee only accepted about 3 or 4 of those recommendations.

So that this long list of excise taxes had no relation to that phase of the subject, but they were imposed for revenue tax purposes. I now yield briefly to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. REED of New York. The gentleman from Tennessee will recall that we introduced a tax bill and spent much time on the tax bill known as the Knutson bill. The gentleman will recall that that bill was enacted into law. It was vetoed by the President and we had to go through the bill three different times and each time the President vetoed it. When it came to the final test we overruled the President's veto with the help of the Democratic Members on your side.

Mr. COOPER. That bill was vetoed not because of the excise-tax treatment, but because of certain income-tax provisions.

Mr. REED of New York. But you used all the time, some of which could have been devoted to the question of excise taxes.

The President wanted them all considered together.

Mr. COOPER. The fact is that some of us begged and pleaded with certain Republican Members to give some consideration to excise-tax relief, instead of giving so much relief to the high-income-tax brackets.

Mr. REED of New York. Seventy-one percent of that bill was for people in the low-income group. The gentleman from Tennessee will recall that the President stated "selfish interests were behind the tax reduction of the Eightieth Congress." Let us see what the tax-reduction bill of the Eightieth Congress actually did.

It increased personal exemptions and credits for dependents from $500 to $600 for all taxpayers and thereby removed 6,000,000 taxpayers from the tax rolls. Did this show a selfish interest or an attempt to provide relief for all taxpayers? The President opposed this.

It placed husbands and wives in the non-community-property States on the same basis for Federal income-tax purposes as husbands and wives living in community-property States. Can this be said to be a selfish interest? The President opposed this.

It provided an additional income-tax exemption of $600 to persons over 65. This was an effort to provide for old people whose main source of income came from business and annuities and who, because of their age, were no longer able to continue in the working force. Was this demanded by selfish interests? The President opposed this.

It gave the blind people an additional exemption of $100, increasing the special exemption for blind from $500 to $600. Was this demanded by selfish interests? The President opposed this.

It granted percentage reductions in tax to all taxpayers ranging from a 12.6-percent reduction in the first bracket to a top 5-percent reduction in the higher brackets. In fact, of the total relief provided in the tax-reduction bill, over 71 percent went to persons with income under $5,000. Was this reduction demanded by selfish interests? The President opposed this.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Chairman, we are not serving any good purpose by prolonging this discussion now, because the excise-tax subject is to be considered by the Ways and Means Committee at an early date.

Certainly, in making the point of order, I do so in the interest of orderly procedure. It is not intended to reflect any views that I may entertain on the excise-tax subject. I have felt all along that some of those taxes should be repealed and certain others should be reduced. But we now have under consideration an income-tax bill relating only to the subject of income taxes of life-insurance companies. Certainly, the amendment proposed by the distinguished gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MARTIN] seeking to amend the excise-tax provisions of the Internal Revenue Code is not germane to the pending bill.

On the ground that it is not germane to the pending bill, I make a point of order against the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Massachusetts desire to speak to the point of order?

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Yes; Mr. Chairman, I respect the judgment and the parliamentary knowledge of the distinguished gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. COOPER], but I feel that he errs in his contention. In my judgment, the amendment is in order. This is a tax bill. True, it is a tax-increase bill, but when a tax measure is on the floor, I believe amendments to decrease as well as increase are germane. This proposal has been made a part of the President's message. Therefore, I submit it is germane to consider all of the tax proposals of the President's message. Let us give the consuming public consideration as well as the Treasury.

Certainly, if we are thinking of the general welfare of the people, we should yield the doubt in favor of the best interests of the people.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. GORE). The Chair is ready to rule.

The Committee of the Whole has under consideration House Joint Resolution 371 and a committee amendment thereto, to which the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MARTIN] has offered an amendment. The gentleman from Tennessee has made a point of order against the amendment to the amendment on the grounds that it is not germane. The Chair has examined the text of the resolution, the committee amendment, and the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts. House Joint Resolution 371, and the committee amendment thereto, deals with the Internal Revenue Code in one particular, to wit, the income-tax liability of insurance companies. The amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts deals with sundry and different parts of the Internal Revenue Code.

The fundamental test of germaneness, according to the precedents of this body, is that a proposition submitted must be akin and relative to the particular subject matter to which the proposition is offered as an amendment.

The Chair holds——

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. Chairman.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that it is not proper to interrupt the ruling of the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair trusts the gentleman from Nebraska will permit the Chair to finish the statement on his ruling.

The Chair feels that this fundamental test of germaneness is not met by the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts. Therefore, the point of order is sustained.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, what little I have to say is directed primarily to the chairman of the subcommittee that presided over the hearings on this resolution.

I would like to have one matter cleared up, which is ambiguous, in my mind.

On page 4 of the committee report, I find the following:

> Representatives of the industry have expressed a strong preference for the resolution as amended. This preference appears to be based in part upon the fact that under the amendment a tax liability would be established for each of the years in which no liability accrued under existing law.

I can illustrate the question that I wish to propound to the Chairman, who is a very fine lawyer and a highly respected Member of this House, by taking one of my own policies as an example. I have eight or nine policies of life insurance. One of them is a paid-up policy in a mutual company. I have not the policy here and have not read it lately, but it was my understanding when I took out that policy for $2,500, which is now fully paid up, that my beneficiaries would receive from the insurance company for the premiums that I paid, $2,500 upon my death and in addition thereto receive the earnings represented by the money that I paid as premiums and the dividends which I left with the company to buy paid up insurance. In other words, my heirs would get the full amount of the face value of the policy and in addition the full amount of the proportionate earnings of my premiums.

According to the report on the resolution under consideration there was not any liability for taxes in 1947, 1948, and 1949. I do not see how Congress, even if the directors of the life insurance company want to do it, can deprive policy holders of a certain part of the moneys in the trust to which their contract entitles them. I would like to have that question answered. Just because the insurance companies' officers say they are perfectly willing to pay taxes, does not give them any legal right, as I see it, to carve out money that the policyholders have already earned when there was no tax due on the company's earnings. This money the policy holders are entitled to under their policies.

Mr. LYNCH. I do not believe that is what they have done. I do not believe it is up to them to say whether or not they are going to pay; it is up to the Congress of the United States. We impressed that very strongly on them. But here is a point that I believe the gentleman overlooked, that the policy the gentleman mentioned does not provide that all the earnings of the premiums shall apply to the policy when it becomes due. Every policy of insurance that I know of provides that the policyholder shall get such part of the earnings as the board of directors or board of trustees may determine. I think that is fundamental insurance law. In this particular instance what the insurance company executives have done was not to give away any of the money of the policyholders but to determine the formula by which the earnings should be taxed. They themselves came in and helped us work out the committee formula. They could come in and help us or they could stay away, but we were the ones who asked for their suggestions so that their policyholders would not be hurt. I feel that we have worked out a good formula, and the reason I say so is because when you get 95 percent of the industry to agree that the formula we worked out is fair, then it must be fair, and it should be accepted by the House.

Mr. JOHNSON. I thank the gentleman, but it does not fully satisfy my mind on the matter, and I would like to make another comment. I do not want to be critical, because I think that the formula principle of taxation in the case of insurance companies is a good principle. As I remember the terms of the policy, having left all my dividends in the company it now would have a face value of about $3,815.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from California has expired.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for two additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California is recognized for two additional minutes.

Mr. JOHNSON. If there were no tax due, how could they take the money that I have earned under the contract and pay it for a liability that was not due or in existence when I paid the money? The gentleman has not fully answered that.

Mr. LYNCH. The question, it seems to me, is quite clear. There is no liability under the present law, but we are passing this law so that there will be a liability, and we have done it time and time again in other cases. In the 1936 Revenue Act we went back 28 months. But the present situation is entirely different from that case.

Mr. JOHNSON. Does not the gentleman believe that in this case there is a contract? The policy is the contract. Congress cannot pass a law that impairs the obligation of contracts that people have legally executed, such as the life-insurance contract I am referring to.

Mr. LYNCH. We are not compelling them to break any contract. They will distribute such earnings as are not needed to meet their expenses. This tax is one of the expenses of the insurance companies and it is necessary to help support the Government.

Mr. JOHNSON. Not for those past years, when there was no obligation to pay these taxes. The very law on the books then was such that nothing was due on my life-insurance contract on the company that wrote it.

Mr. LYNCH. At least, that is my understanding of it. That is what we have in the bill and that is what I hope will go through.

Mr. JENKINS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. JENKINS. The gentleman has propounded a very serious query. In the case cited by the gentleman, here is what the company will have to do, and this is what I tried to bring out: They will have to get money out of some other fund and put it in a fund to cover the gentleman's purposes. In going into some other fund they will lay themselves open to an injunction from any policyholder.

Mr. JOHNSON. They are impairing a contract that I have with a company.

Mr. EBERHARTER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. EBERHARTER. The gentleman does not contend that the mutual insurance companies would obligate themselves to pay money first to the policyholders before paying taxes?

Mr. JOHNSON. The gentleman knows that the taxes were not due for several years past, but now by this resolution we are going back and creating an obligation at a time when there was none under existing law. That is in the report. The point I am making is they are by this resolution compelled to pay taxes that were never due, thereby violating their contract with me.

Mr. EBERHARTER. They are not violating their contract. Taxes are due before they pay anything to the mutual policyholders. We are making this act retroactive and we are basing it upon decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States.

Mr. JOHNSON. I do not think the gentleman gets the point I have been trying to make.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from California has expired.

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words.

Mr. Chairman, I feel I would be derelict in my duty and in my responsibility to my constituents and to the minority members of the Ways and Means Committee if I did not at this time make a statement. We are under a great responsibility since the ruling of the Parliamentarian or the Chair that this proposed excise-tax amendment is not in order. There is a terrific buyer's strike going on in this country.

Fifty members of the Republican Party introduced bills in the first session of the Eighty-first Congress to reduce excise taxes. Many of those bills were sent down to the Treasury and an adverse report came back on each one of them, which means opposition by the President to excise-tax relief. That is a matter of record in the Committee on Ways and Means.

In view of the alarming conditions that exist in the field of excise taxes, I feel it is the duty and responsibility of the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means, our splendid chairman, fine statesman that he is, in this crisis, in this emergency, to immediately call a meeting of the Ways and Means Committee and report out an excise-tax bill forthwith, to take care of this excise situation instead of involving it in a general tax bill which it is proposed to consider before they touch excise taxes, and which will not come up until next Thursday. The hearing on taxes on Thursday next will have nothing to do with excise taxes. At that time Secretary Snyder will go into the matter of tax revision, not excise relief. Now is the time when we ought to act, when the country is facing a difficult situation that requires immediate action. I urge that the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means meet this excise-tax situation and meet it forthwith.

Mr. CHURCH. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. CHURCH: Page 6, after line 7 insert the following new section to read as follows:

"SEC. 3. If any insurance company which was placed in receivership and its business operated by another insurance company as a separate fund under a management contract approved by the court having jurisdiction of the receivership, for the benefit of the policyholders of such company in receivership, and the management contract has, pursuant to its terms, terminated and final distribution and accounting made to the policyholders with the approval of the proper State supervisory officials, then the tax imposed by this joint resolution, insofar as it applies to the business operations for the years 1947 and 1948 of any such separate fund so terminated, shall not apply."

Mr. CHURCH. Mr. Chairman, I hope that the committee will accept this amendment. The problem to which it relates is an extremely complicated one, and has many ramifications. It may be that the language of my amendment is not technically perfect, but this can be ironed out either when the bill is before the other body or in conference.

This bill imposes a tax on insurance companies retroactively for the years 1947, 1948, and 1949. There are, however, cases where an insurance company has represented the business of a defunct insurance company as a separate fund. It administered the business under a management-fee contract for the benefit of the policyholders of the defunct company. All of the profits and earnings were turned back to the policyholders to reduce the liens against their policies.

Under the terms of the bill as it now stands, the tax would be imposed against the income received in connection with these separate funds. Inasmuch as the fund has been distributed and an accounting made, there is no way by which the company can charge the fund for the tax or in any way recoup it.

All that my amendment purports to do is to eliminate any additional tax liability as imposed by this bill in just such cases as this. It is my understanding that there are only two such cases; that of the Washington National Insurance Co., which administered the National Life fund of the defunct National Life Insurance Co., and that of the Lincoln National Life Insurance Co. of Fort Wayne, Ind., which administered the so-called Royal Union fund.

Mr. LYNCH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CHURCH. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. LYNCH. I wish to state to the gentleman that this matter did not come up before the subcommittee. It only came up within the last few days. As I understand, there is only one company involved, or possibly two. But, in any event, we have been making a study of the matter, and from our study it seems that there is a great deal of merit to the amendment that the gentleman has proposed. While I am not so certain that the language carries all the details or that it is the way we would finally like to have it, I wish to say that the committee will accept the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CHURCH] to the committee amendment.

The amendment to the committee amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HALE. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the committee amendment as amended.

Mr. Chairman, this legislation dawned on me out of a clear sky, and it is, perhaps, presumptuous of me to talk about it. But I am profoundly disturbed about this legislation, and it seems to me it is quite wrong in principle. I am not at all satisfied with the defense that has been given to the legislation by the members of the subcommittee, although I do not doubt that they worked very diligently on the matter.

I happen to be the holder of several insurance policies, and I learned last week for the first time from the President's message that those corporations were not subject to any income tax for their incomes in 1947, 1948, and 1949. That was owing to a sort of a freakish situation which probably was inequitable, but the fact remains that no tax accrued due from those corporations.

The gentleman from North Carolina, the distinguished chairman of the committee, said this morning that no honest man would plead the statute of limitations in defense of a just debt. No doubt. But there is no just debt here. There was no debt at all. As I understand, the justification urged for a retroactive tax is that the life-insurance companies themselves agreed that they were unduly lucky, and would be willing to pay taxes, and the association representing the companies has apparently indicated a willingness to pay the tax. I do not think that is enough.

It does not seem to me that the president or the treasurer or the board of trustees of a life-insurance company, in which I happen to have a policy, has any right to agree with the Treasurer of the United States to make gifts to it, or to pay taxes not due. Of course, when the corporations pay taxes that are not due, they do in effect make gifts. I am not suggesting that the $93,000,000 which these corporations would pay in taxes would really endanger the safety of the policies which I hold or the safety of the policies which other people hold. But certainly the insurance companies would be giving away property of the policyholders which they have no right to give away.

I have not seen the cases at all, and it is rather interesting to note that in the report on this bill not a single case is cited to show the constitutionality of a law imposing a retroactive tax on earnings way back 3 years ago. Even if there be constitutional precedent for such an extraordinary legislation it seems to me thoroughly unwise. Why cannot the distinguished Committee on Ways and Means go back and say that the tax rate which I paid on my income in 1948 was not high enough, and boost that?

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HALE. I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. JOHNSON. To the extent that they spent money for taxes not due, they carved that much out of your policy, that you have paid for.

Mr. HALE. Of course they did, there is no question about it. It is very significant that no member of the Committee on Ways and Means and no member of the subcommittee has controverted that point.

Mr. FULTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HALE. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. FULTON. May I compliment the gentleman on bringing out the fact that it applies to retroactive taxes of one type, and it might apply to another type such as the income tax. If it applies to the income tax generally, it may go back to the year when we first started that tax in the United States.

Mr. HALE. If you go back retroactively to the year 1947, why should you not go back to 1927 or 1917? Why should you not even go back and impose a tax for the period before the income-tax amendment to the Constitution was adopted?

Mr. FULTON. That is exactly right.

Mr. HALE. My father back in the nineties did not pay any tax on his income at all. What are you going to do about that?

Mr. FULTON. May I ask this further question: If there is no limit on the retroactivity of it, either as to kind or variety or as to time, you are opening up a whole Pandora's box by this amendment. Then, if you make an exception between bankrupt companies and others, you have another unreasonable difference.

Mr. MARTIN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last three words.

Mr. Chairman, following up a bit on the remarks of the distinguished gentleman from New York [Mr. REED], some of us have been pressing long and hard to get some action or indication from the Treasury Department as to their attitude on excise taxes. The gentleman from New York [Mr. REED] made the statement that all of the Republican bills had been reported adversely. I introduced a bill, House Resolution 4489, on May 3. A request was made of the Treasury Department by the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means for a report. I called the Committee on Ways and Means last night to find that there is no report back yet on my bill, although the request is on record as of May 5.

With that type of service from the Treasury Department, I think you will realize that members of the Committee on Ways and Means are seriously handicapped in making an accurate study and an accurate determination of the attitude or the views of the Treasury Department on bills that we have introduced in this field. The time is here now when we need that action, that indication, that help, and that cooperation from them if we are to approach the excise-tax field with any degree of understanding.

I cannot give you any break-down or any estimate of the cost of my bill from their point of view, and I expected such information last May, when we requested the report from the Department.

It is my appeal at this time that we get better cooperation than that from the Treasury Department in the excise study we are going into in the Committee on Ways and Means.

H. R. 4489 is in the automotive field, a field that I consider very fundamental, one that reaches to the pocketbook of practically every American in some form or other. It is of far-reaching importance. I want the Treasury Department's cooperation and the attention of the majority side of the Committee on Ways and Means to a thorough study immediately on repeal of excise taxes in that particular field.

In my view, the emergency Federal automotive excises must be included in any plan for tax adjustments at this session.

There is no question that Congress imposed these only as temporary taxes to raise funds needed in an emergency. The emergency is over, Congress should now keep it promise to repeal these taxes.

The States are embarked on one of their largest road-building programs that must of necessity rely in great part upon the motor-vehicle use taxes for the required financing. The vehicle owner should no longer be subjected to the duplication of this type of taxation, brought about through the Federal Government's invasion of this field.

These Federal taxes—levied on gasoline, oil, tires, tubes, parts, accessories, and new vehicles—are contributing to the critical financial problems of city transit companies. In some cases, these taxes no doubt make the difference between black ink and red ink; present fares, or increased fares. They are contributing to the financial problems of the whole motor-carrier industry.

This is just one example of the present effect of these imposts, which put an unfair burden on everyone who uses highway transportation. Because they represent an important part of the cost of a new car, bus, or truck, they make purchase that much more difficult. When they are levied on replacement parts, the Federal Government is in effect placing a tax on hardship.

Through these taxes, the man who must use automotive transportation to earn his living or to supply his customers is required to pay more general taxes to the Federal Government than another who does not. This is particularly true of the farmer.

H. R. 4489 provides for the repeal of these excises and end this injustice. The Federal automotive taxes are taxes on necessities, not on luxuries. The time definitely has come to repeal them.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Chairman, I dislike to impose the strict rules of the House during this debate, but we have had a rather wide range of debate on something that is not involved in the pending legislation at all.

So, Mr. Chairman, I ask for a vote on the committee amendment.

Mr. FULTON. Mr. Chairman, I object.

Mr. EDWIN ARTHUR HALL. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. EDWIN ARTHUR HALL. Will opportunity be given to offer other amendments to this bill?

Mr. COOPER. Does the gentleman from New York have an amendment to the pending amendment?

Mr. EDWIN ARTHUR HALL. I have an amendment at the Clerk's desk.

Mr. COOPER. Then, Mr. Chairman, may I suggest the gentleman from New York offer it now.

Mr. FULTON. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object——

The CHAIRMAN. There is no unanimous-consent request pending before the Committee at the moment.

Mr. FULTON. Mr. Chairman, a point of order. I understood there was an amendment pending, and then there was a unanimous-consent request made upon which there was no ruling. I reserved the right to object, and now another amendment is being offered.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair did not understand that a unanimous-consent request was submitted. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from New York, to offer his amendment.

Mr. EDWIN ARTHUR HALL. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment which is at the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. EDWIN ARTHUR HALL: "Strike out everything after the enacting clause."

Mr. EDWIN ARTHUR HALL. Mr. Chairman, may I say at the outset I think the distinguished minority leader made one of the most constructive proposals this afternoon for reducing taxes that has yet been made. I want to go a step further and say that it was a great regret to me when the President in his tax message to the Congress did not dwell on the repeal of the excise taxes on cameras and photographic equipment.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. EDWIN ARTHUR HALL. I yield.

Mr. KEATING. I quite agree with the gentleman in that regard and it is a definite indication that the President, in making these recommendations, did not have consideration for the thousands of people employed in that industry in the gentleman's district as well as in my own district.

Mr. EDWIN ARTHUR HALL. May I say to the gentleman that in his district in Rochester and in mine in Binghamton the camera and photographic equipment manufacturers resent this unfair tax.

Mr. EBERHARTER. Mr. Chairman, a point of order.

The gentleman is not speaking on the amendment.

Mr. EDWIN ARTHUR HALL. I will get around to that, if the gentleman will let me.

Mr. CHURCH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. EDWIN ARTHUR HALL. I yield.

Mr. CHURCH. I commend the gentleman for his statement that the excise taxes on the industry of photographic instruments should be taken off or at least reduced.

It was definitely a higher tax than most of the other people had to pay to require these people to convert their very unique industry to the war effort during wartime. They want to have a reduction and not necessarily to wipe out the taxes.

Mr. EDWIN ARTHUR HALL. Yes, as I understand it in the President's message regarding taxes there were two categories in which he placed these excise taxes. One was the communication and transportation tax group which he recommended be taken off, and the other included the photographic equipment and cameras which was referred to as the manufacturers' tax, and that he recommended being kept on. I think it was a mistake. I think we should take off all these taxes. Insofar as the city of Binghamton goes, my home city, there are some 8,000 Ansco workers who are really suffering from this 25-percent increase in camera prices due to the tax because this increases the prices of photographic equipment generally.

Our headaches began in the Ansco Corp. when the Government took over the corporation and brought the Robert Heller experts in to do a job on it. They did a job on it all right. They threw out nearly 1,000 employees. They were paid a mighty fat fee for their engineering ability. They were supposed to use the meat ax here and there; and, for your information, the Robert Heller "experts" are now being sought to do the same job on Congress. They are going to attempt to cut here and there in the legislative department, and if you do not watch out they will cut about half the Representatives of this House off the docket. So you have got that to consider. After what happened to the Ansco employees, you can draw your own conclusions, because so many were lopped off their pay roll. It has raised hob in the city of Binghamton, and there is a great deal of unemployment there, due to the fact that these "experts" came in there and just about ruined the whole show.

Mr. CHURCH. I believe the President overlooked this matter. I think he still intends that that tax be included by way of reduction.

Mr. EDWIN ARTHUR HALL. Well, whatever it is, it is time the House got busy and took off these excise taxes, and that we put real pressure on the President to go along with the plan.

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. EDWIN ARTHUR HALL. I yield.

Mr. McCORMACK. We are always glad to hear the distinguished gentleman from New York. He is always very interesting. I find him very magnetic, and I thoroughly agree in part with what he has said. I would like to see all of these excise taxes removed, but I am sure my friend from New York would not stop there, and will agree with me that when we repeal them entirely, or in part, that we should raise the revenue some place else.

Will the gentleman go along with me on that?

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. EDWIN ARTHUR HALL. I will be glad to yield.

Mr. McCORMACK. Will not the gentleman answer me?

Mr. EDWIN ARTHUR HALL. All I want to see is the 25 percent taken off the price of cameras, so the folks in my district can have a job. I would like to see the Ansco Corp. employed to the peak.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York [Mr. EDWIN ARTHUR HALL] has expired.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, it was not my purpose to speak on this bill, but I decided to say a few words.

I am supporting the measure. In doing this I am not unmindful of the fact that it is a retroactive tax. The committee in its deliberations gave attention to certain court decisions dealing with the right of the Congress or any other taxing body to levy a tax, retroactively. I sincerely hope that this Congress never attempts to see how far it can go in a retroactive tax. I believe it is a bad principle that we should stay away from. The corporations of the country and individuals of the country have a right to know when their books are closed, what their taxes are, and that subsequent transfers, adjustments, settlements, and payments are not disturbed because they did not know what their tax liability was.

I think in defense of this bill, however, it should be stated that, generally speaking, the element of surprise or lack of knowledge that there would be a tax liability does not exist. This situation which has arisen was not the result of any conniving or scheming on the part of the insurance companies. Neither was it something that the Congress anticipated. Since it did arise it has been the subject of constant discussion and negotiation.

Certainly, I do not believe that the committee intends to convey the idea that officers of a life-insurance company could consent to taxation; that you can have voluntary taxation. That is not the situation. These men were called in, and conferences were had for the purpose of discussing the mechanics, the ways and means and methods of placing a tax on them, comparable with what the rest of our business economy carried. The bill is here not because of the companies' request of acquiescence, or because of their consent; it is here because of the power of the Federal Government to levy a tax. I believe that whenever possible we should refrain from the levying of retroactive taxes. If it ever is permissible from a moral standpoint this is probably one such instance, but even at that it is something we do not like and to which we should not resort. I very reluctantly go along, because I believe it is about the best we can do to work equity in this particular situation.

Mr. FULTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CURTIS. I yield.

Mr. FULTON. In respect to the retroactive feature, what is the basis upon which the committee chose to make the tax retroactive?

Mr. CURTIS. That is the year in which the existing formula was such that no liability accrued.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CURTIS. I yield.

Mr. CRAWFORD. I am somewhat a believer in this retroactive law, for as I understand this case we have a situation where a law put on the books ceased to function. There was from a moral standpoint a tax liability; insurance companies proceeded to set up contingent reserves on their balance sheets to take care of the liability as, when, and if determined by the Congress. They have kept those reserves ready to pay a tax as, when, and if the Congress said so. This proposition is here by substantial agreement of the insurance industry; that is, those affected under this bill have come forward, you might say, to carry their fair share of the tax liability of citizens of this country. If that be the situation, wherein do we violate any rule against retroactivity?

Mr. CURTIS. That is the situation and I doubt if we have actually violated any such principle, but we should proceed with caution, because it is not a sound principle of legislation.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Nebraska has expired.

Mr. EDWIN ARTHUR HALL. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to withdraw my amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the committee amendment.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, I move that the Committee do now rise and report the bill back to the House with an amendment, with the recommendation that the amendment be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the Committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. GORE, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union, reported that that Committee, having had under consideration House Joint Resolution 371, relating to the income taxes of life-insurance companies for 1948 and 1949, had directed him to report the resolution back to the House with an amendment, with the recommendation that the amendment be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the bill and the amendment to final passage.

The previous question was ordered.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time and was read the third time.

Mr. JENKINS. Mr. Speaker, I offer a motion to recommit.

The SPEAKER. Is the gentleman opposed to the bill?

Mr. JENKINS. I am, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the motion to recommit.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. JENKINS moves to recommit House Joint Resolution 371 to the Ways and Means Committee.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the motion to recommit.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion to recommit.

The motion to recommit was rejected.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the passage of the bill.

The bill was passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "Joint resolution to correct the formula used in computing the income taxes of life-insurance companies for 1947, 1948, and 1949."

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

GENERAL LEAVE TO EXTEND REMARKS

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members who have spoken on House Joint Resolution 371 may be permitted to revise and extend their remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Tennessee?

There was no objection.

THE HISS CASE—A LESSON FOR THE AMERICAN PEOPLE

Mr. NIXON. Mr. Speaker, this is the first time during my service in this body that I have imposed upon the membership by asking for a special order for the purpose of addressing the House. I have done so on this occasion because I feel that I have a solemn responsibility, both as a member of the Committee on Un-American Activities and as a Member of this House to lay certain facts concerning the case which led to the trial and conviction of Alger Hiss for perjury before the Members of the House and the American people.

This case and the implications which arise from it involve considerations which affect the very security of this Republic. This Nation cannot afford another Hiss case. It is essential therefore that we recognize the seriousness of the crime involved, the extent and scope of the conspiracy of which Mr. Hiss was a member, the reasons for failure to bring that conspiracy to light until it was too late to prosecute those involved for the crime they had committed, and the positive steps which we can and must take now to guard against such a situation in the future.

In discussing the case, I shall go into some detail, particularly with respect to that period during which the Committee on Un-American Activities was conducting its investigation and its hearing. I believe that a presentation of these details will enable the Members of the House to reach their own conclusions as to what lessons the American people should learn from this tragic experience.

Mr. JACOBS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. NIXON. I yield to the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. JACOBS. Before the gentleman goes into the question of the details, and as to what should be done, I should like to ask the gentleman whether or not he would consider the bill that I introduced last year, on January 24, to be one which might have been helpful in bringing to justice those who did violate the laws, which provides that the running of the statute of limitations applicable to any offense committed by an individual who is an officer, agent, or employee of the United States, shall be suspended during any period that such individual holds the office, position, employment, or appointment that he held at the time the offense was committed?

Mr. NIXON. I think there is no question but that such a bill would have been of great assistance in this case. In fact, later on in my remarks one of the legislative recommendations which I intend to endorse is a bill which would extend the statute of limitations in espionage cases from 3 to 10 years. It is along the line, of course, which the gentleman has presented.

Mr. JACOBS. Would the gentleman agree that the statute of limitations should be suspended as to an offense committed by any man in public office until after he is out of public office, and particularly any offense that pertains to misfeasance or malfeasance in office?

Mr. NIXON. I do not think there is any question about the validity of the gentleman's position.

Mr. JACOBS. I have such a bill that I introduced in January of last year.

Mr. NIXON. Let me say at this point that I would appreciate it if the Members of the House would allow me to proceed with the balance of my remarks without interruption. I shall be glad to yield at the conclusion for any questions which you may have.

This story began in 1948, on July 31. On that date the Committee on Un-American Activities began its investigation into Communist espionage within the Federal Government. The witness who appeared that day was Elizabeth Bentley. She testified before the committee for several hours during the day, both in executive session and in public session, and she named a number of Government employees who, during the war, she said, turned over to her confidential and secret Government documents. That testimony had a tremendous impact upon official Washington. There were charges and countercharges, denials that the testimony was true. The committee, as a result, called in a number of the individuals Miss Bentley had named and gave them the opportunity to give their side of the case. Some of them persisted in their denials, but the majority of them, when they came before the committee, followed the line of refusing to answer any questions covering Miss Bentley's charges on the ground that any answer that they would give to the questions might tend to incriminate them.

On August 3, just a week after Miss Bentley appeared, the committee called before it a witness we thought might be able to corroborate some of her testimony. Up to this time all we had was Miss Bentley's testimony about the espionage ring she said she worked with. No other member of the ring had broken, and consequently it was only her word against the word of some who denied the charges and others who refused to answer questions on the basis of self-incrimination.

I mention this because the charge has been made on several occasions that Mr. Chambers on his own initiative came before the Committee on Un-American Activities and asked for the opportunity to testify so that he could smear Mr. Hiss in a public forum. That was not the case. The committee went to Mr. Chambers. We had learned that he had made charges many years ago, in 1939, to the officials of this Government concerning Communist activities among Federal employees in the period between 1934 and 1937. Consequently we subpenaed him to appear before the committee for the purpose of seeing whether he could corroborate Miss Bentley's testimony in any respect.

This was the first time any member of our committee had had the opportunity to see Mr. Chambers. We saw before us a man who was not, at first appearance, a very impressive witness. He spoke in a very low voice. On several occasions the chairman had to ask him to raise his voice so that the members of the press and the members of the committee could understand what he said. But the charges he made were of a most serious nature.

He said he had been a Communist until 1938 and that from 1934 to 1937 it was his assigned duty to work with a ring of Communist Party members who held positions in the Government. He named some of the people who were members of the ring. He named others at later sessions of the committee, when we went into the matter in greater detail.

Among the people he named that day were Alger Hiss and Donald Hiss, who had held high positions in the State Department, Lee Pressman, the former general counsel of the CIO; Nathan Witt, the former secretary of the National Labor Relations Board; John Abt, a former Labor Department attorney, Henry Collins, who was with the State Department, and Harry Dexter White, an Assistant Secretary of the Treasury at the time he left Government service.

I mention only a few of the names because it serves to give you an indication of the importance of the people Mr. Chambers said were members of his group.

The day after Mr. Chambers testified we received a request from Mr. Alger Hiss to appear before the committee for the purpose of denying the charges. Let us lay the stage for Mr. Hiss' appearance.

Mr. Chambers was a man of considerable standing. He was one of six senior editors of Time magazine and, according to the information we received before he testified, one of the most able and respected men on the Time staff.

Mr. Hiss was the president of the Carnegie Foundation for International Peace. You know his phenomenal record in Government service. I do not need to go into that. Mr. Chambers had charged that Mr. Hiss had been a Communist between 1934 and 1938. He had denied the charges and asked for the opportunity to be heard. The committee granted him that opportunity.

Mr. Hiss appeared before the committee for the first time on August 5. He said in effect two things: First, that he was not and had never been a Communist; and second, and this was his first mistake, that he had never known a man by the name of Whittaker Chambers. When shown a picture of Chambers he said he could not recognize it as anybody he might have known.

I remember he looked up at the chairman, who was presiding that day, Mr. MUNDT, of South Dakota, now a distinguished Member of the other body, and said, "If this is a picture of Mr. Chambers he is not particularly unusual looking. He looks like a lot of people. I might even mistake him for the chairman of this committee."

At the conclusion of Mr. Hiss' testimony that day, those of you who were there, and I see a number of you in the Chamber today, will remember the great impression he made upon the committee, upon the press, and upon those who were there as spectators. I would say that 90 percent of those who were in the committee room were convinced that Mr. Hiss was telling the truth. They were convinced that he was not a Communist, and they were further convinced that he was telling the truth when he said that he did not know Mr. Chambers.

Immediately after the public hearing the committee went into an executive session, and at that point the Hiss-Chambers investigation was almost dropped. It was almost dropped because most of the members of the committee felt that Mr. Chambers must have either been mistaken as to the identity of the man he had named, or that he had concocted this story in order to destroy Mr. Hiss because of some sinister motive that had not been apparent when he had testified before us.

Mr. Stripling, the chief investigator of the committee, and I had some doubts. I do not say that to indicate that we had any greater ability to analyze the evidence than the other members who attended the hearing. But by reason of certain conduct of Mr. Hiss on the stand, we felt at least that we should investigate further to determine whether or not Mr. Hiss or Mr. Chambers was lying on the critical issues. We knew we could not establish which man was telling the truth on the issue of whether Mr. Hiss was a Communist because unless we could get somebody else to break who was a member of the same ring, it was simply Mr. Chambers' word against Mr. Hiss'. But on the question of whether or not Mr. Hiss knew Mr. Chambers, that certainly was a simple issue of fact the truth or falsity of which could be established by corroborative evidence. As a result, we did a very simple and obvious thing. We went to New York City on August 7, subpenaed Mr. Chambers and put him under a grueling cross-examination for a period of 3 hours, during which time we went into the most intimate details of his relationship with Mr. Hiss.

I point this out because this was the first time that such an investigation had been made, despite the fact that it was back in 1939 that Mr. Chambers had made these same charges and had made them in even greater detail to Mr. Berle, who was then in the State Department.

As we asked Mr. Chambers these questions we got forthright answers, one after another, and when he completed his testimony we came to the conclusion that either Mr. Chambers knew Mr. Hiss, or that he had made a very careful study of Mr. Hiss' life and as a result of that study, had been able to answer the questions. To give you an indication of how thoroughly we went into the matter, these are some of the questions we asked:

"What was his nickname?

"Did they have any pets?

"What was his hobby?

"What kind of car did he have?

"What houses did he live in while you knew him?"

I remember one question particularly. When we asked what Mr. Hiss' hobby was, Chambers said:

Mr. and Mrs. Hiss were both amateur ornithologists. They used to get up early in the morning and go to Glen Echo, out the canal, to observe birds. I recall once they saw to their great excitement, a prothonotary warbler.

We knew from that answer alone that one person could not know such intimate details about another unless he had known him some time in his life.

We returned to Washington and began what at the outset seemed to be the almost impossible task of checking the accuracy of the information Mr. Chambers had given us. It was particularly difficult because we could get no assistance whatever from the intelligence agencies of the Government due to the President's freeze order.

It was essentially a team operation. The acting chairman of the committee, the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. MUNDT], had the complete cooperation and assistance of each of the committee members, including the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MCDOWELL], the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. VAIL], the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. RANKIN], and the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. HÉBERT], all of whom spent literally hours analyzing and developing the evidence. The committee staff, under the direction of the chief investigator, Mr. Robert Stripling, worked on a round-the-clock basis. The committee's director of research, Mr. Benjamin Mandel, did particularly effective work in suggesting penetrating questions to be put to the witnesses.

We checked the houses where Mr. Hiss had lived. We checked motor-vehicle registrations and transfers. We even checked dog kennels in Georgetown trying to establish the truth or falsity of Chambers' answers.

The story checked out in every detail where corroborative evidence was available. We then concluded that we had enough evidence to ask Mr. Hiss to come before us again and explain if he could how Mr. Chambers could know these things about him.

On August 16 Mr. Hiss came before us again this time in executive session. We went right down the line asking him the very same questions we had asked Mr. Chambers. We got the same answers. So at the conclusion of that testimony we said, "Mr. Hiss, we have asked Mr. Chambers these questions and he has given us the same answers that you have given us. Tell us now how it is possible for a man you do not even know to know these intimate things about you."

Mr. Hiss still had not come to the point where he could or would admit that he had known Mr. Chambers. But he said he had once known a man by the name of George Crosley, to whom he said he had rented his apartment in Washington early in 1935 and who had welshed on the rent. He had also given him an automobile, ridden to New York with him on one occasion, and Crosley, his wife and child had spent several days in his home with him and Mrs. Hiss. But he did not think Crosley could be Chambers and he did not know Crosley to be a Communist.

The obvious thing to do then was to confront these two men, since we had diametrically opposing stories, and since it was apparent that both men must know each other, in view of the testimony we had. The confrontation took place in room 1400 of the Commodore Hotel, New York City. I will describe what happened briefly to indicate to you why the committee came to the conclusion that there were some very grave doubts about the story Mr. Hiss had told in his first appearance before the committee on August 5.

We brought Mr. Hiss into the room first and seated him in a chair. We then had a committee investigator bring Mr. Chambers into the room from behind him and had him sit on the sofa opposite Mr. Hiss. During the time Mr. Chambers was entering the room, Mr. Hiss, who had said he would like to see this man who had made these charges against him, stared straight ahead. He did not turn around once to look at Mr. Chambers as he entered the room.

Then we had the two men rise. I said:

Mr. Hiss, can you identify this man as anybody you have ever known?

Mr. Hiss said:

I wonder if you could have him speak.

I asked Mr. Chambers to state his name and his business. Mr. Chambers answered. Mr. Hiss rose from his chair, advanced on Mr. Chambers, and demanded that he open his mouth wider and also go on talking. Mr. Chambers tried to do so and Mr. Hiss raised on tiptoe and peered into his mouth. Then he said:

Mr. Chairman, was his voice when he testified before the committee pitched in a lower key?

Mr. McDowell said it was about the same. Mr. Hiss said:

Would you ask him to read some more?

I happened to have handy a copy of Newsweek magazine, which I handed to the senior editor of Time magazine, and he read from that.

Mr. Hiss then said that Chambers' teeth looked different and that he would not want to identify him as Crosley until he checked further.

I asked Mr. Chambers if he had ever had any work done on his teeth, and he said he had some bridgework done in the front of his mouth.

We thought certainly Mr. Hiss would admit then he had known Mr. Chambers as Crosley. But no. He said:

I wonder if you could give me the name of the dentist who did the work.

I said:

Do you mean you would have to have a man's dentist tell you just what he did to his teeth in order to identify him as somebody you once knew?

At that point Mr. Hiss changed the subject, and eventually, about 30 minutes later, he finally admitted that Chambers was the man that he had once known as Crosley. But he continued to deny that Chambers was known to him as a Communist, or that he was a Communist or that there was anything at all to the charges which Chambers had made.

We returned to Washington and called in Lee Pressman, John Abt, Henry Collins, and Nathan Witt. They all refused to answer questions on the ground of self-incrimination when we asked them if they knew Chambers or Hiss.

On August 25 we brought Chambers and Hiss together again in a public session in Washington. As a result of that public confrontation, public opinion concerning the truth or falsity of the charges which Mr. Chambers had made, began to change. Because of that change Mr. Hiss was placed in a position where he felt he had to vindicate himself.

This is the way he went about it. At the confrontation scene on August 16, in New York City, he had dared Mr. Chambers to make his charges in public so that he could sue him for libel. Mr. Chambers went on a radio program, Meet the Press, on August 27. He was asked whether Mr. Hiss was a Communist. Without relying upon the perfect right that he had to say that he had answered that question before the committee and was under no obligation to repeat it publicly and run the risk of a suit, Mr. Chambers answered, "Mr. Hiss was a Communist and may still be."

One week, two weeks, three weeks passed and Mr. Hiss still had not filed suit. Finally, an editorial appeared in the Washington Post, a newspaper which had been very favorable to Mr. Hiss editorially and extremely critical of the committee for conducting any hearings at all on the Chambers' charges. But this editorial took Mr. Hiss to task and said that in view of the fact that he had dared Mr. Chambers to make his charge publicly, and he had proceeded to do so, it was now up to him to bring the suit, lest the implication be left that there might be some truth in what Mr. Chambers had said. Finally the suit was brought and a chain reaction was started which was to crack the case wide open.

On November 17, 1948, Mr. Hiss' attorneys took Mr. Chambers' deposition in Baltimore, and in that deposition Mr. Hiss' attorneys were to make their greatest mistake.

They asked Mr. Chambers to produce any documentary evidence that he might have which would establish that Mr. Hiss and he were Communists together. Mr. Chambers produced a thick envelope containing four pages in Mr. Hiss' handwriting and a great number of typewritten documents which he said had been typed on Hiss' typewriter. These documents contained excerpts and summaries of scores of confidential and secret State Department messages.

Now, mark this date, because it is extremely important. This was November 17. That very same day, Mr. Alexander Campbell, the Assistant Attorney General in charge of the Criminal Division, was called by counsel for both sides to come to Baltimore to pick up the documents. Two weeks later on the 1st day of December, a very interesting United Press dispatch appeared in the Washington Daily News. This article said in effect that the Justice Department was going to drop the Hiss-Chambers case for lack of evidence and that unless some new evidence was presented the Department would not be able to determine which man was lying.

Now, understand, the dispatch quoted Justice Department sources. And the Department at that time had had in its possession for 2 weeks what Mr. Murphy, the prosecutor in the Hiss trial, has so well called the immutable proof of espionage; page after page after page of confidential, secret State Department documents, some in the handwriting of Mr. Hiss, and others typed on his typewriter. Yet the article said the Justice Department was going to drop the case for lack of evidence.

It was at this point that the Committee on Un-American Activities came back into the picture. Mr. Stripling and I went to Westminster, Md. We questioned Mr. Chambers; we asked him if it were possible that he might have some additional evidence which might bear upon this case in view of the fact that the Justice Department was going to drop it. He was shocked when he learned of this proposed action. He told us that he had been told not to talk about what had happened at the deposition hearing in Baltimore on November 17, but we were able to gather from the conversation with him that some new development in the case had occurred on that date, so when we returned to Washington, D. C., I ordered that a subpena be served upon Mr. Chambers for any other documents that he might have.

As a result of that subpena being served upon him, we obtained the so-called pumpkin papers, 5 rolls of microfilm, containing photostatic copies of literally scores of confidential and secret documents from the State Department and the Bureau of Standards. With this evidence in our possession, we were able to force the matter into the open by convincing the Justice Department that unless it did proceed with its investigation the Committee on Un-American Activities would have to conduct its own investigation of the case.

The rest, of course, is history. Mr. Hiss was indicted on December 15, 1948. The first trial ended in a hung jury, eight for conviction and four for acquittal. Then came the second trial and the guilty verdict reached last Saturday, in which the jurors found Mr. Hiss guilty of perjury in denying that he had turned over these confidential Government documents to Mr. Chambers.

In relating the facts of this case, it has not been my purpose to attempt to convince you that the verdict against Mr. Hiss was justified. There has been too much of a tendency to look upon this case as simply a dramatic conflict between two striking and powerful personalities, Mr. Hiss on the one side and Mr. Chambers on the other.

Whether Mr. Hiss was to be found guilty of the technical crime of perjury with which he was charged was not primarily important as far as the security of the Nation is concerned. What is important is that we not allow the conflict between these two men to obscure the broader implications of the case. This is not a simple case of petty larceny where a common thief sold stolen documents to the highest bidder. This is a case involving far-reaching implications going to the very security of our country, and it is essential that each and every American citizen recognize those implications for what they are.

In the first place, the conspiracy which existed was amazingly effective. Chambers turned over to the Committee and the Justice Department hundreds of pages of confidential and secret documents from the State Department and other Government agencies. The theft of documents in this quantity would in itself be sufficient to cause us grave concern. But Chambers testified that on at least 70 different occasions the members of his espionage ring had obtained a similar amount of documents for transmittal to Soviet agents.

Some State Department apologists have attempted to belittle the gravity of the crime on the ground that the documents were not important. An indication of their importance is that today, 10 years after they were taken from the State Department, three of them have still not been made public because the State Department claims that to make them public would be injurious to the national security of this country.

Even more pertinent on the matter of the importance of the documents is the testimony of Mr. Peurifoy, Assistant Secretary of State in charge of Security, and Mr. Sumner Welles. Both testified that a foreign agent having in his possession even one of the many documents which Chambers turned over to the Government could have broken our secret code. This meant, in other words, that the foreign agents who obtained these documents from Chambers broke the American code and were reading all of our confidential communications with foreign governments during that critical period immediately preceding the Hitler-Stalin pact.

The second point we should not forget is that a great number of people other than Mr. Hiss were named by Chambers as being members of his espionage ring. A run-down of the various positions held by the members of the ring indicates the effectiveness with which the conspiracy was able to infiltrate into vital positions, both in Government and in industry. Mr. Chambers' contacts included: Four in the State Department; two in the Treasury Department; two in the Bureau of Standards; one in the Aberdeen Arsenal; a man who later became general counsel of the CIO; one in the Picatinny Arsenal; two in the Electric Boat Co.; one in the Remington Rand Co.; and one in the Illinois Steel Co.

It is significant that the individuals named, almost without exception, held positions of influence where they had access to confidential and secret information. The tragedy of the case is that the great majority of them were American citizens, were graduates of the best colleges and universities in this country, and had yet willingly become members of an organization dedicated to the overthrow of this Government.

At this point I should like to bring to the attention of the Members of the House some facts which have been published in the papers but which have not received the attention they should. Some people still have the idea that all we have in this case is Mr. Chambers' word against Mr. Hiss, and the documentary evidence. But, you will recall that in both the first and second trials, another member of the ring, who was a State Department employee, confessed, as Mr. Chambers has confessed. His name was Julian Wadleigh. You may have read his confession which appeared in serial form in the Washington Post. Mr. Wadleigh admitted that for a period of over a year, approximately every 2 weeks, he walked out of his State Department office with a brief case full of confidential and secret State Department documents. He would meet Mr. Chambers or the other agent who had been assigned to him at the time on a street corner and he would hand him the brief case.

That night the documents would be microfilmed, and the following morning he would meet him at another rendezvous point, pick up the brief case, take it back to the office, and put the documents in the files so that they would not be missed. Mr. Wadleigh's admission was important primarily because it had the effect of taking the case out of the realm of fantasy and provided solid corroborative evidence to back the Chambers' story.

Among the other individuals that Mr. Chambers testified were members of his Communist apparatus was Harry Dexter White, former Assistant Secretary of the Treasury. You will recall that shortly after Mr. White's appearance before the Committee on Un-American Activities in 1948, he passed away. Immediately the critics of the investigations charged that the Committee on Un-American Activities was responsible for his death because we had given credence to the completely unfounded and, note this, undocumented charges that had been made against him by Whittaker Chambers and by Elizabeth Bentley. In fact, even today, a member of the faculty of a great New England college is delivering a series of lectures in which he is taking the committee to task for ever conducting any investigation into Mr. White's loyalty.

When Mr. Chambers testified before the committee, in 1948, he stated that Mr. White was not a member of the Communist Party but that he was ideologically in sympathy with the party's objectives. In the second trial, which has just been concluded in New York, Mr. Chambers was questioned further about Mr. White and declared in open court that Mr. White was a source of information for the Soviet espionage ring and that he, Chambers, had received various documents from White which he turned over to Soviet espionage agents.

Since December of 1948, I have had in my possession photostatic copies of eight pages of documents in the handwriting of Mr. White which Mr. Chambers turned over to the Justice Department on November 17, 1948. I had intended to say nothing about these documents, but since Mr. Chambers testified that he did receive documents from Mr. White, I think the public is entitled to see and consider the evidence.

These facts have definitely been established:

First. A Government handwriting expert, Mr. Harold Gesell of the Veterans' Administration, has established that the documents were in Mr. White's handwriting.

Second. Mr. Chambers, a confessed espionage agent, had the documents in his possession.

Third. A substantial portion of the information contained in these documents was of a confidential nature.

I have the photostats here on the rostrum. Any of you who would like to examine them upon the adjournment of the House today is welcome to do so.

Let me read just one excerpt from this document which may be of interest to you:

> We have just agreed to purchase 50,000,000 more ounces of silver from China. China will have left (almost all in London) about 100,000,000 ounces of silver. Her dollar balances are almost all gone.

I discussed this excerpt with a man whose judgment I value in analyzing such documents, and he informed me that that information in the hands of individuals who desired to embarrass the Chinese Government would be almost invaluable.

Then to give you an indication of the scope of the matters covered, let me read just one sentence which appears at the bottom of one of the pages:

> Secretary reading Red Star Over China and is quite interested.

The Secretary of the Treasury then, of course, was Mr. Morgenthau.

The full text of the papers which were in Mr. White's handwriting follows:

> January 10, 1938: Taylor tried to press the Secretary (indirectly through Feis to Hull to Secretary) to hurriedly accept an offer from Hungary of settlement of her $2,000,000 debt to United States Government. The payment offered was trivial. Secretary refused to be hurried and said did not want to establish a pattern on these international debt settlements without considering the whole problem. The fact that the Hungarian amount involved was trifling was no reason to accept this offer as it raised matters of principle, precedent, policy, etc.
> (What is behind Taylor's, and possibly Feis', desire to press M into a debt-settlement arrangement of that character at this time? Why didn't Taylor try to convince Secretary directly instead of surreptitiously via Feis?)
> January 9, 1938: United States Naval Captain Ingersoll will remain in London until English want to communicate anything to us with respect to Japan boycott or exchange controls. He is to act solely as an agent of communication and not discuss matters. English are not now interested in economic boycotts against Japan. Some incident may develop which will lead them to be desirous of our cooperation. We are likely to act alone only if unusually bad incident occurs such as another Panay incident.
> Japan, according to Colonel Strong, has increased greatly its storage facilities for oil. Tanks built underground with two layers of thick cement and air space between as protection against bombing.
> Reported yesterday through private Japanese banking connection (unknown but supposed to be important) that J. will not declare war on China for some time at least.
> Secretary reading Red Star Over China and is quite interested.
> Japan's dollar balances in United States are not declining much. They are about $50,000,000 dollars.
>
> Purchases of Japanese goods by * * * are decreasing sharply while our exports to those countries are increasing.
> State Department believes British moves toward Italy and Germany will reduce substantially European fear of war in the near future.
> If Japan repeats another incident like the Panay incident, Treasury machinery is all ready to embargo Japanese imports into United States and freeze her dollar balances. This was done at the President's orders. It remains unknown outside of Treasury.
> We have just agreed to purchase 50,000,000 more ounces of silver from China. China will have left (almost all in London) about 100,000,000 ounces of silver. Her dollar balances are almost all gone.
>
> Bullitt just called to Secretary (copy not available) comments by Herriot, Blum, Reynaud to him. Herriot says if he were Premier he would quickly strengthen ties with U. S. S. R. and reassure Czechoslovakia that France will at once come to her military aid if Germany enters Czechoslovakia. He also stated that if U. S. S. R. goes to aid of Czechoslovakia she would cut through Rumania's resistance like butter and would also go through quickly Latvia, Estonia against their wishes. Herriot doesn't think there is any chance, however, of his becoming Premier.
> Reynaud believed the solution of French economic situation is to permit a sharp drop in the franc. Also to form a national cabinet that would include all elements. Blum claims he doesn't want to be Premier at this time.
>
> Marchandeau tried feebly to get England and United States to agree to support the franc. (Not the slightest chance.) The prospects of continued depreciation of franc are very strong.
> I have heard nothing as to Captain Ingersoll's mission in England beyond my earlier explanation. So far as the Treasury is concerned he is supposed to be there in case of another incident with Japan. In that event he would serve as secret liaison man between England and the United States unknown to anybody as to the nature of his mission. Chamberlain turned us down at the time of the Panay incident when we asked him whether he would cooperate with us in placing exchange restriction against Japanese operations in case we decided to do so. But another Knatchbull incident may bring them around.

> State Department was eager to accept Hungary's debt offer and sold idea to Secretary Marshall and the President. But Congress doesn't want to begin debt negotiations with Hungary. The Van Zeeland report was not taken seriously here.
> (Via Cochran) Bachman of the Swiss National Bank said (February 15, 1938) that the Japanese have recently put out a feeler to some of his banks for a loan for industrial development in Manchukuo. "However, his bankers had not sufficient interest in such a proposition even to submit it to the National Bank for consideration and possible approval."
> "Schacht impressed me—and some of my friends also—as finding some hope in the Van Zeeland report as a basis for a possible approach between German and the British and the French.
> "Schact said he positively did not know what had taken place at the meeting between Hitler and Schuschnigg."

The third point we should bear in mind is that the conspiracy was so effective, so well-entrenched and so well-defended by apologists in high places that it was not discovered and apprehended until it was too late to prosecute those who were involved in it for the crimes they had committed. There were several occasions during the past 10 years on which, if vigorous action had been taken, the conspiracy could have been exposed and its effectiveness destroyed.

The tragedy of this case is summed up right in the charge itself, because what was this man charged with? With stealing documents? With passing them to a foreign agent? No. He was charged with perjury, for lying when he said that he did not turn over these documents. The reason is that neither Mr. Hiss nor Mr. Wadleigh nor any of the people who were engaged in this activity and who turned over documents, even if they were to admit it today, can be prosecuted under the laws of the land, because the 3-year statute of limitations has lapsed and it is too late to do anything about the crime they have committed.

How did such a situation develop? Let us look at the facts and the record.

Three days after the Hitler-Stalin pact, Mr. Chambers in the company of Mr. Isaac Don Levine went to A. A. Berle, then Assistant Secretary of State in charge of security, and laid the facts concerning the conspiracy before him. He told Mr. Berle, in fact, considerably more about the individuals involved than he told the Committee on Un-American Activities in his first appearance before us on August 3, 1948.

What was done? Mr. Berle says that he checked with Dean Acheson and Felix Frankfurter on the charges concerning the Hiss brothers. I quote from the answer he received from Acheson as Mr. Berle related the conversation to the committee:

> Acheson said he had known the family of these boys from childhood and could vouch for them absolutely. I further found that Mr. Justice Frankfurter would give them exactly similar endorsement. You have therefore a chain of endorsements from the men for whom they had worked.

In any event, the net result was that Chambers returned to New York and never heard from Berle or any other Government official concerning the charges he had made until 1943.

What was done by Mr. Berle or anybody else in authority to establish the truth or falsity of the very serious charges which Chambers had made? Did he question Hiss? Did he question Chambers? Did he confront the two? The only people who can tell us what was done are the high officials in the Government who were aware of the charges. We do know, in any event, that as far as the individuals named by Chambers were concerned, the only thing that was done to them was to promote each one of them eventually to higher positions of power and influence within the Government.

The failure of the administration to act at that time has been justified in some quarters on the ground that only recently have the people of this country become fully aware of the nature and seriousness of the Communist threat and that it is not fair to use hindsight in criticizing the actions of people in years past when the Communist threat was not recognized as it is today. This argument has some justification insofar as the period of the war is involved. But it is significant to note that at the time Chambers made his charges to Mr. Berle, the Soviet Union was an ally of Hitler Germany, and in effect, therefore, an enemy along with Germany of all the free peoples of the world including the people of the United States, and the President of the United States, Mr. Roosevelt so characterized it. There therefore was no excuse whatever for failure at least to investigate the Chambers' charges and to see that the individuals named were "quarantined" so that they would not be in a position to furnish information to a potential enemy of this Nation. In that connection, it is significant to note that information furnished to the Soviet Union during the Hitler-Stalin pact might well have been transmitted by the Russians to their Nazi allies.

In 1943, representatives of the FBI visited Chambers at his farm in Westminster, Md., and he told the story in detail again to them after he had called Mr. Berle and received permission to do so. In can be assumed that this information was made available to officials of the Justice Department and to whatever other agencies whose personnel were directly involved in that they had been named by Chambers as members of his apparatus. Again, however, no action was taken by our officials to establish the truth or falsity of the Chambers' charges.

Let me say at this point that I am not critical of the administration or of the officials who were involved for failing to prove that the Chambers' charges were true, but I am critical of their failure to investigate those charges or at least to go so far as to bring the two principal characters in the story together as the Committee on Un-American Activities eventually did.

It was after 1943, that Mr. Hiss was Secretary of the Bretton Woods Conference, went to Yalta with President Roosevelt and acted as Secretary of the UN Conference at San Francisco. It is inconceivable that those who were responsible for appointing him to these high positions, where he had the opportunity to do untold damage to his country by transmitting confidential information to the Soviet Government which they could use in their negotiations with us, were not aware of the charges which had been made.

It will be claimed that at this time we were allies of the Soviet Union and had no reason to suspect that they would engage in espionage against us. But let me say at this point that there is no question whatever but that the top officials of our Government were aware of the fact that the Russians were engaging in espionage activities against us even while they were our allies. The testimony of General Groves before the Committee on Un-American Activities in 1948 on that point is significant. I quote the testimony:

> Mr. STRIPLING. General Groves, did you ever report the efforts of the Russian agents to obtain information regarding atomic development to the President of the United States?
> General GROVES. Yes.
> Mr. STRIPLING. When was that?
> General GROVES. It would have to be in 1944. It was contained in a report to the President which President Roosevelt read in my presence and the matter was discussed with me. This was just before he left for Yalta. It was brought to the attention of President Truman in the first report that was made to President Truman after he took office, which was as soon after his taking office as the Secretary of War could make an appointment, and on that occasion the written memorandum was read by Mr. Truman.

In other words, concrete information concerning Communist espionage activities in this country was in the hands of both President Roosevelt and President Truman and still no action was taken to check the Chambers' charges against officials who held high positions in the Government at that time.

I am sure that some Members of the House are wondering why the FBI which received information concerning the various charges in 1943 was unable to take any direct action leading toward prosecution and exposure of the individuals involved.

At this point, I think it would be well to outline the duties of the FBI as distinguished from the Enforcement Division of the Department of Justice. The FBI is solely an investigatory body. It has no power to subpena witnesses, to bring them together for purposes of confrontation against their will, or to prosecute individuals that the Bureau may feel deserve prosecution.

It is a fact-gathering agency and once the facts are laid before the Enforcement Division of the Justice Department, its responsibility is ended. Consequently, no blame can attach to the FBI for failure to expose the facts of this case. The FBI has no power to make public the findings of its investigations except when called upon to do so in a court of law. Responsibility, however, does lie with those officials of the Government who had access to the FBI reports, and who failed or refused to institute an investigation which would lead to prosecution and conviction of those involved.

In answer to the charge that they were lax in investigating and prosecuting the members of the conspiracy, some administration officials have stated that the Chambers' charges were completely unsubstantiated and that there was no reason to take his word against that of the individuals he had named. I have information which bears on that point which I would like to present to the House at this time.

You will recall the Canadian Atomic Espionage case which resulted in the trial and conviction of nine members of the Soviet espionage ring in that country in less than 1 year's time after the charges had been made against them. Incidentally, the prompt action on the part of our neighbor to the north is in sharp contrast to the humiliating failure of our Government to take any action whatever in this country against the individuals involved in wartime espionage for the Soviet Union until it was too late to prosecute them for the crimes they had committed.

When the Canadian case came to public attention, it was universally assumed that there would be a similar prosecution in this country. It is common knowledge that Canadian officials expected that our Government would take such action. Since the major facilities for developing the atomic bomb were located in the United States rather than in Canada, it would be apparent to anyone that the Soviet Union would direct its major espionage activities against this country.

In spite of these facts, no action of any type has been taken, except for the disclosures made by this committee in 1948 involving scientists at the University of Chicago and the University of California, who were charged with engaging in espionage and most of whom pled self-incrimination when they came before the committee.

Let me say at this point a word about the plea of self-incrimination in regard to the Canadian espionage case. I have often been asked the question at public meetings and by Members of this House as to why the Committee on Un-American Activities is not able to proceed like the Canadian Royal Commission. The Canadian Royal Commission, has been universally commended and justifiably so for the effective manner in which it investigated and brought to trial and conviction the members of the Canadian atomic espionage ring. But there is one significant difference that I should like to bring to your attention today.

You will note that on several occasions I have pointed out that many of those who were named as being members of espionage rings, when they came before the committee or before the grand jury and were asked about their activities answered by saying, "I refuse to answer the question on the ground that any answer I give to the question might tend to incriminate me." Let me say on that point, I do not see how a no answer—"No"—to a question as to whether a person engaged in espionage activities could incriminate anybody. But, be that as it may, the Canadian Royal Commission was not confronted with that difficulty. Under the Canadian War Secrets Act, no individual who was charged with a crime involving the national security could hide behind the self-incrimination plea. The Canadians who were so charged were compelled to answer questions, and that is one reason for the great success of the Canadian investigation.

Now, returning to the case at hand statements have been made, but until now not confirmed, that at the time of the Canadian exposé Igor Guzenko, the Soviet code clerk, who turned over information to the Canadian Government which resulted in the trials and convictions had been questioned by intelligence agents of the United States and had furnished information dealing with espionage activities in this country.

I can now confirm that statement. Shortly before the first trial of Mr. Hiss, I learned that a secret memorandum, dated November 25, 1945, dealing with Soviet espionage in the United States and prepared by an intelligence agency of this Government, was circulated among several key Government departments and was made available to the President. I said nothing at that time about the information which was contained in the memorandum because I did not want to take action which might influence the trial one way or the other. Now that the trial is over, I believe that the country is entitled to the information.

I quote directly from that memorandum:

> Igor Guzenko, former code clerk in the office of Col. Nicholi Zabotin, Soviet military attaché, Ottawa, Canada, when interviewed by a representative of this Bureau and officers of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, stated that he had been informed by Lieutenant Kulakov in the office of the Soviet military attaché that the Soviets had an agent in the United States in May 1945 who was an assistant to the then Secretary of State, Edward R. Stettinius.

Note the date of this memorandum, November 1945. Note the position held by the individual alleged to be the Soviet espionage agent—assistant to the Secretary of State, Mr. Stettinius. Mr. Hiss was an assistant to Mr. Stettinius at the Yalta Conference in February of 1945.

I have here Mr. Stettinius' book, Roosevelt and the Russians. If you read the book you will find eight different references to Mr. Hiss.

On page 36 it appears that Stettinius reviewed with Hiss and others the following:

First. Establishment of a European high commission.

Second. Treatment of Germany.

Third. The Polish question.

Fourth. Relation between UNRRA and the Soviet.

Fifth. Rights of Americans on control commission of Bulgaria, Rumania, and Hungary.

Sixth. Iran.

Seventh. China.

Eighth. Turkish Straits question.

Ninth. International trusteeship.

Page 49: Stettinius had a discussion with Hiss and others on the political and economic situation in Italy.

Pages 83 and 84: Stettinius met Hiss and others "to review our proposals for the conference agenda."

Page 137: Stettinius and Hiss met to "go over notes for the afternoon meeting of the three leaders."

Pages 195 and 196: Alger Hiss is mentioned as a member of a subcommittee which included Gromyko, which was at work preparing a report.

Page 238: Stettinius "asked Hiss to do a quick summary of the State Department memorandum on the trusteeship."

I will not read further; I think the facts speak for themselves.

Note the source of the information which I have quoted from the memorandum. This is not idle back-fence gossip; this information came straight from a representative of the Soviet Government itself. There is one thing that I have learned in my service on the Committee on Un-American Activities, and that is that the Communists will lie about almost everything but they do not lie to each other about the members of the espionage and underground organizations of which they themselves are members.

They know who their people are.

What was done when this shocking information came to the attention of the officials of our State Department, and the President of the United States? You would think now that Mr. Hiss would be confronted with Mr. Chambers and that the mystery would be cleared up, but instead Mr. Hiss continued to serve in high positions in the State Department until he resigned in January 1947 to take a position as head of the Carnegie Foundation for International Peace. In that connection it is significant to note that when trustees of the Carnegie Foundation questioned Mr. Hiss' former associates in the State Department as to his suitability for that position, he received completely unqualified recommendations on all sides. There was no hint whatever that any question had been raised concerning his loyalty to this Nation.

To complete this story of inexcusable inaction upon the part of administration officials to attack and destroy this conspiracy, let me review briefly the conduct of the President and the Department of Justice during the investigation of this case by the Committee on Un-American Activities. On August 5, the day Mr. Hiss first appeared before the committee and denied the charges which had been made against him, the President threw the great power and prestige of his office against the investigation by the committee and for Mr. Hiss by declaring that the hearings of the committee were simply a "red herring."

In other words the "red herring" statement was made in direct reference to the Alger Hiss case.

That same day, he issued a Presidential directive which ordered all administrative agencies of the Government to refuse to turn over any information relating to the loyalty of any Government employee to a congressional committee. This meant that the committee had to conduct its investigation with no assistance whatever from the administrative branch of the Government. Included in this order was, of course, the FBI, who, by reason of that fact, was unable to lend assistance to the committee.

The most flagrant action, however, was yet to come. As I have already stated, the day Mr. Chambers turned over documentary evidence in the handwriting of Mr. Hiss, together with typewritten documents which were later established to be written on his typewriter, the Justice Department was immediately notified and the material was on that day, November 17, turned over to Alexander Campbell, head of the Criminal Division of that Department. The various participants in the deposition were directed in the interests of national security to keep silent on the whole matter. I have before me the previously mentioned United Press dispatch which appeared on December 1 in the Washington Daily News. Let me read from it directly:

> The Justice Department is about ready to drop its investigation of the celebrated Alger Hiss-Whittaker Chambers controversy, it was learned today.
> Department officials still have under study the question of a possible perjury prosecution. But officials said privately that unless additional evidence is forthcoming, they are inclined to forget the whole thing.
> One Department source said that on the basis of available evidence, officials in charge of the case believe it would be unwise to take it before a grand jury.

What happened during that critical 2-week period between November 17 when the papers were turned over to the Justice Department and December 1 when this article appeared?

I have learned from personal investigation that no agents of the Department of Justice even approached Mr. Chambers during that period let alone questioned him about the highly important evidence which he had turned over to the Justice Department. In view of the story which appeared on December 1, stating that the Justice Department was ready to drop the investigation for lack of new evidence, the only conclusion which can be drawn when this fact is coupled with the Department's failure to conduct an investigation during that 2-week period is that it was the intention of the Department not to make an investigation unless they were forced to do so.

As a result of having in its possession the microfilm documents, which we obtained on December 2, the committee was able to force the Department to institute an investigation and the result was the eventual indictment of Mr. Hiss by the Federal grand jury. It is significant to note that even as late as December 5, members of the committee learned from an unimpeachable source that Justice Department officials before proceeding with further investigation of Mr. Hiss were considering the possibility of indicting Mr. Chambers for technical perjury due to his failure to tell the whole story when he first appeared before the committee and the grand jury. For that reason, I publicly stated on that same day that if the Department should proceed in that manner, it would in effect mean that Mr. Hiss and the others named by Mr. Chambers as being members of an espionage group could not possibly be proceeded against due to the fact that the principal witness against them would be an indicted perjurer.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. LYLE). The time of the gentleman from California has expired.

Under previous special order of the House, the gentleman from New York [Mr. MACY], is recognized for 1 hour.

Mr. MACY. Mr. Speaker, I yield such time as he may desire to the gentleman from California [Mr. NIXON], to conclude his remarks.

Mr. NIXON. Even during the first trial of Mr. Hiss, there was reason to wonder whether the administration was desirous of presenting the strongest possible case against him. It is to the eternal credit of Mr. Murphy and Mr. Donegan, and their staff, that they put on their case as effectively as they did, in spite of the fact that high Government officials before and throughout the trial threw the weight of their influence behind the defendant. Mr. Murphy often must have wondered whether or not the Government which he represented was behind him or against him during the trial.

The President had referred to the case as a "red herring" and did so even after the indictment. The Secretary of State, Mr. Acheson, before his confirmation, declared his friendship for Mr. Hiss and the implication of his declaration was that he had faith in his innocence. Two justices of the Supreme Court, Mr. Frankfurter and Mr. Reed, in an unprecedented action, appeared as character witnesses for Mr. Hiss. Judge Kauffman, who presided at the trial stepped off the bench and shook hands with these defense witnesses, one of many of his actions during the trial in which he showed his obvious bias for the defendant. The wife of the former President of the United States, Mrs. Roosevelt, on several occasions during the two trials, publicly defended Mr. Hiss in her news columns. Among the high Government officials who testified in his behalf were Mr. Philip Jessup, then President Truman's ambassador at large in Europe, and now the architect of our far-eastern policy; the Governor of Illinois, Mr. Stevenson; Judge Wyzski, of the United States District Court, Boston; Judge Magruder, chief justice of the circuit court of appeals, Boston; and Francis B. Sayre, Assistant Secretary of State.

I have mentioned the individuals who have come to Mr. Hiss' defense, because this is an outstanding example of how effectively the conspiracy was concealed and how far it was able to reach into high places in our Government to obtain apologists for its members.

Why was it that administration officials persisted in their refusal to act through the years, even when substantial evidence of espionage activities was brought to their attention? A number of reasons have been suggested for this failure.

It has been said that the Soviet Union was an ally of the United States and that therefore we should take a charitable attitude toward those administration officials who failed to act when the evidence was presented to them. But Mr. Chambers first presented his information to Mr. Berle during the period of the Hitler-Stalin pact when it could not be said, under any stretch of the imagination, that the Soviet Union was an ally of this country. Nor can anyone possibly justify the obstructive policies followed by administration leaders even as late as 1948 when the Committee on Un-American Activities was attempting to bring all the facts out into the open and when our announced national policy was to contain communism abroad if not at home.

On the other extreme, there are some who claim that administration officials failed to act because they were Communist or pro-Communist. I do not accept this charge as a fair one as applied at least to the great majority of those officials who could and should have acted on the evidence which was laid before them through the years.

The reason for their failure to act was not that they were disloyal, but this in my opinion makes that failure even more inexcusable.

What was happening was that administration leaders were treating the reports of Communist espionage on a "politics-as-usual" basis. It is customary practice for any administration, be it Republican or Democrat, to resist the disclosure of facts which might be embarrassing to that administration in an election. This is a statement of fact though, of course, I do not mean to justify that practice, regardless of the nature of the skeleton in the political closet.

Because they treated Communist infiltration into our American institutions like any ordinary petty political scandal, the administration officials responsible for this failure to act against the Communist conspiracy rendered the greatest possible disservice to the people of the Nation.

It is essential that we learn the tragic lessons which the Hiss case has so vividly portrayed, and develop a policy which will reduce the possibility for the existence and successful operation of such a conspiracy in the future. I have some recommendations to make along those lines, most of which are not new, but which I reiterate because I feel that they are essential to our national security.

First. Above all, we must give complete and unqualified support to the FBI. and to J. Edgar Hoover, its chief. Mr. Hoover recognized the Communist threat long before other top officials recognized its existence. The FBI in this trial did an amazingly effective job of running down trails over 10 years old and in developing the evidence which made the prosecution successful.

I note in the papers this morning that the National Lawyers Guild has again launched an all-out attack against the FBI. The character of the guild is well illustrated by the fact that 5 of the lawyers for the 11 convicted Communists in New York City, who were cited by Judge Medina for contempt of court because of their disgraceful conduct, are prominent members of the Lawyers Guild. Let me say just this: That when the National Lawyers Guild or any similar organization is successful in obtaining an investigation of the FBI and access to its records, a fatal blow will have been struck against the protective security forces of this Nation. I am sure that the Members of the House will join with me in resisting such an attack and in supporting the finest police organization which exists in a free Nation today. [Applause.]

Second. Time will not permit me to discuss all the steps which should be taken in the field of legislation if we are adequately to control and expose the Commuuist conspiracy in this country. But the very least that should be done during this session of Congress is to extend the statute of limitations on espionage cases from 3 to 10 years. The fact that an espionage agent is able to conceal his activities so effectively that he is not apprehended until after the statutory period had elapsed makes the crime even more infamous and serious in nature. Our present laws are totally inadequate to deal with the new types of espionage which have been developed so effectively by the Communists.

Third. The Committee on Un-American Activities should receive the wholehearted support of the House. It is well recognized that had the committee not been in existence, the Hiss conspiracy might never have been exposed.

Let me say at this point that I know the Members of this House are aware of the fact that membership on the Committee on Un-American Activities should not be sought by any person who desires to avoid probably the most unpleasant and thankless assignment in the Congress. I trust that Members from both sides will join together in supporting that committee and its members in the years to come, and in seeing to it that it gets the authority and the funds to conduct honest, intelligent, and fair investigations of Communists and other subversive groups in his country.

Fourth. It is necessary that we completely overhaul our system of checking the loyalty of Federal employees. Mr. Hiss would have passed the present loyalty tests with flying colors. The loyalty checks are based primarily on open affiliations with Communist-front organizations. Underground Communists and espionage agents have no open affiliations and it is therefore almost impossible to apprehend them through a routine loyalty investigation under the President's order. Serious consideration should be given to changing the entire approach under the loyalty order and placing the program on a security risk rather than loyalty basis. In this way, where there is any doubt about an individual who has access to confidential information, that doubt can be resolved in favor of the Government without the necessity of proving disloyalty and thereby reflecting on the character of a possibly loyal but indiscreet Government employee.

Fifth. Most important of all, we must develop and put into effect an extensive educational program which will teach the American people the truth about communism as well as the truth about democracy. The tragedy of this case is that men like Alger Hiss who come from good families, are graduates of our best schools, and are awarded the highest honors in Government service, find the Communist ideology more attractive than American democracy.

This is a serious reflection on our educational system, and it is essential that we remedy the situation if we are to survive as a free people. The statement of Mr. John Foster Dulles when he commented upon the Hiss verdict last Saturday is particularly pertinent:

> The conviction of Alger Hiss is human tragedy. It is tragic that so great promise should have come to so inglorious an end. But the greater tragedy is that seemingly our national ideals no longer inspire the loyal devotions needed for their defense.

Five years ago, at the time of the Dumbarton Oaks Conference in 1944, when Alger Hiss served as director of our secretariat, the number of people in the world in the Soviet orbit was 180,000,000, approximately the population of the Soviet Union. Arrayed on the anti-totalitarian side there were in the world at that time, in 1944, 1,625,000,000 people. Today there are 800,000,000 in the world under the domination of Soviet totalitarianism. On our side we have 540,000,000 people. There are 600,000,000 residents of United Nations countries which are classified as neutral, such as India, Pakistan, and Sweden. In other words, in 1944, before Dumbarton Oaks, Teheran, Yalta, and Potsdam, the odds were 9 to 1 in our favor. Today, since those conferences, the odds are 5 to 3 against us.

The great lesson which should be learned from the Alger Hiss case is that we are not just dealing with espionage agents who get 30 pieces of silver to obtain the blueprint of a new weapon—the Communists do that, too—but this is a far more sinister type of activity, because it permits the enemy to guide and shape our policy; it disarms and dooms our diplomats to defeat in advance before they go to conferences; traitors in the high councils of our own Government make sure that the deck is stacked on the Soviet side of the diplomatic table.

America today stands almost alone between communism and the free nations of the world. We owe a solemn duty, not only to our own people but to free peoples everywhere on both sides of the iron curtain, to expose this sinister conspiracy for what it is, to roll back the Red tide which to date has swept everything before it, and to prove to peoples everywhere that the hope of the world lies not in turning toward totalitarian dictatorship but in developing a strong, free, and intelligent democracy.

THE ALGER HISS CASE

Mr. MACY. Mr. Speaker, as my colleague from California stated that he had not asked for the privilege of the floor since his incumbency in the Congress, may I point out that the same is true of me. I would not ask for the privilege of the floor unless I felt the seriousness of the present situation and I will put my colleagues at ease at the beginning by stating that so much has been said on this subject and said so beautifully that I am going to adhere pretty much to the notes that I have made and therefore you need not expect to be detained too long.

Mr. Speaker, after listening to my colleague's address to this House, there can be left little doubt in the minds of those within the sound of his voice, that he has rendered the kind of service to our country these confusing and complicated times we are enduring sorely require. Had it not been for the tenacity of a Representative from the State of California, RICHARD M. NIXON, coupled with his unusual mental ability and supplemented by his thorough knowledge of the law, a broad scale cover-up might have been effected in a far-reaching and important case that could lead others into taking such further advantage of our Constitution and laws as to bring even so powerful a Nation as ours under the control of the strange and evil ideologies that now threaten the world.

To another Representative, the gentleman from Wisconsin, FRANK B. KEEFE, a distinguished lawyer from the State of Wisconsin, we are indebted for an exhaustive address delivered in this House on July 18 of last year upon the subject of the conduct of Judge Samuel Kaufman in the Alger Hiss trial. No one could have heard that without many misgivings as to the manner in which that judicial proceeding was conducted. Both before and after that date last July, I put in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD comments regarding Judge Kaufman and quoted editorials showing the type of support being accorded him by the Communist press in the city of New York. For what I had to say I was taken to task by the Washington Post, in whose columns as well as in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD I made prompt response.

I am proud to be a Member of this House, representing as it does by population a Nation that has brought more health, welfare and happiness to a greater number of people than any other ever on the face of this globe. While we have Members like Representatives NIXON and KEEFE, and, of course, there are many others, we can rely upon the exercise of such prerogatives as we individually possess toward letting in the light of day on whatever the people of this Nation should know about the workings of their Government.

Not a lawyer myself, I can only bring to the problem in hand the layman's point of view, but I am sure that I can do so the better for having heard the judicial phases of this intricate case dissected by the two able lawyers to whom I have just referred and of whom our colleagues and fellow citizens have every right to be proud.

After weeks of trial, a jury of respectable American citizens, eight of them women, and therefore natural guardians of home firesides and our traditional American social system, have found Alger Hiss guilty of perjury.

The conviction of Hiss for perjury in this criminal action is the equivalent of convicting him of betraying his country's secrets. Even Hiss defenders will concede his perjury consisted of lying about the fact that he acted as a link in the Communist spy network. Why did not Hiss admit this instead of lying about it? He knew that if he lied under oath he would be subjecting himself to severe penalties for perjury. He also knew that the charges were susceptible to proof because he was confronted with the witnesses and the documents necessary to establish the case. On the other hand, he knew that he could tell the truth without fear of prosecution since any action was barred by the statute of limitations. Why then did he lie? I submit that the only logical conclusion is that he lied not to protect himself, but to protect others. By lying Hiss deliberately and wilfully placed himself in jeopardy. The truth could not have hurt him. However, it might have implicated others still active in Russian espionage who could be brought to justice. Of course, if Hiss wished to stand trial for espionage, he could do so by waiving the statute of limitations. However, in the light of his past actions it would be foolish to assume that he will do so.

No more important verdict than the Hiss conviction has been reached in our day, its repercussions resulting from the forthright act of 12 good and true Americans will be world-wide. If this conviction serves notice to the world that the American people are on guard against Communism, and that they propose to invoke their laws to protect themselves from enemies from within and without, no longer will the American people temporize with, or listen to, the fellow travelers who have been hiding behind a mask of so-called liberalism while pulling Soviet Russia's chestnuts out of the fire. Fellow travelers—intellectually sympathetic, who worked with Hiss, are now on notice that their turn would probably be next.

Squealing and discomforted left-wing columnists, like splinters from the Communist trunk, are left-handedly coming to the rescue of Hiss by advising true Americans not to make an issue of his conviction. These columnists of the far left who seem to be inspired by the acts of men in high places in our Republic, have never been noted for the constructive interest that they have taken in preserving our form of government. For many years, these true Americans have been the target for their smear. Now that Hiss, one of their pets, has had the mask torn from his face by due process of law, these left-wingers have the cynical nerve to admonish these true Americans not to talk about the outcome of the trial, not to make an issue of it, and not to feel the natural sense of relief that the perfidy of this individual has been exposed. It should be remembered that our legal constitutional processes carefully surround anyone accused of a crime, and guarantee that they shall receive a full and fair trial by a jury of American citizens. The authors of our Constitution in their wisdom made no place for such columnists in our judicial system.

Apropos of these columnists, I should like to refer to a syndicated item appearing in a local paper in my own home district, which closes with this:

I have the feeling that it will not win * * * much popularity among the rank and file of voters. It is too deeply mortifying to most Americans to be reminded of the unhappy era when faith fell away and, more important, there will be a persistent doubt whether Hiss received a fair trial in the present atmosphere when guilty accusers seek to unload their burden of guilt by public accusation. President Truman, talking, in his state of the Union message, about what a strong and free America can do came much closer to the temper of today.

What a sorry spectacle this Hiss matter has become. When his treacherous perfidy was first revealed, the President of the United States called it a red herring. I said then in connection with the red-herring statement by President Truman, way back on August 14, 1948:

I do not have to be told that words alone may not constitute treason under section 3, article 3, of the Constitution of the United States and that this section when it refers to giving aid and comfort to the enemies of the Nation, means literally a nation, or its nationals, with whom we are actually at war.

But I have said recently, and I say again today, that the statement that the inquiry concerning communistic activities and undercover work is only a red herring to distract public attention from other events, is treasonable in spirit and effect as giving aid and comfort to potential enemies of the United States.

True, we are not actually at war, but it is true also that war could develop and a state of war come to exist between the United States of America and the U. S. S. R. before those who hear these words have had their breakfasts tomorrow morning.

I go further—I say that in this manner President Truman, after the fashion of some of the muddled thinking of the day, unwittingly used the prestige of his high office on behalf of one of his country's enemies. President Truman should reread his oath of office. When he made his "red herring" statement, he edged dangerously close to the impeachment area. The President has also stated that Communism in this country was merely a "bugaboo" and that he does not believe that there will ever come a time when anyone will really want to overturn it. By thus attempting to minimize the seriousness of the situation with which we are confronted and by ridiculing the efforts of honest-to-God Americans working for the best interests of this country, the President sets the pattern and style for a "head in the sand" attitude toward Communism which merely makes more difficult the task of bringing to the bar of justice those who seek to betray our country.

During the recent Hiss trial the press reported that a defense witness, a psychiatrist named Binger, stated in 1948 that "the bugaboo of Communism" was "spreading a state of neurotic anxiety in the United States" and that this bugaboo was "fanned largely by big business." It is this type of irresponsible thinking which plays directly into the hands of our enemies.

And what of Secretary Acheson, who has known for years about the oft-circulated accusations concerning Alger Hiss? And what does he mean by his statement of yesterday that he does not intend to turn his back on Hiss? The American people are entitled to know. Mr. Acheson has just humiliated the American people by openly favoring the policy of appeasing Soviet Russia by giving comfort to the Chinese Reds. What is the new Acheson doctrine? Is it the Truman doctrine? Is it for containment of Communism? When we have spent thirty-three billions since the close of the fighting war, mainly for containing Communism in western Europe while the reverse policy has been in effect in the Far East where the Communist numbers have increased from under 200,000,000 to close to a billion. This was distinctly set forth in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD a week ago Monday by my distinguished colleague, the gentleman from Wisconsin, LAWRENCE H. SMITH. Are we failing in unified American doctrine? Is the administration split apart or is it just some more muddled thinking?

And to pursue the verities still further, we have the spectacle of Associate Justices of the United States Supreme Court, of one of whom Hiss was a protege, appearing as character witnesses in the trial. And now we come to one of the most ironical items in the entire Hiss mess. Roving Ambassador Philip Jessup, now in the Far East, gathering facts and conclusions upon which to base recommendations for the conduct of our affairs with the Communists, was a character witness for Hiss in his second trial. One must ask just how naive these men are who sit in high places in our country. I do not accuse them of being fellow travelers, but it is obvious that a lot of fellows have been traveling with them.

What a national tragedy—a trusted bright young man who sat with Roosevelt, Stalin, and Molotov—this trusted bright young man, who posed smilingly with Molotov at the counsel table in San Francisco during the period when the United Nations was having its birth pains, is now dishonored and a felon.

But a thing far more tragic is the fact that those entrusted with the duty of formulating our foreign policy and protecting us from Communism abroad cannot even protect us from Communist activity going on under their very noses. And even when it is pointed out to them by competent authority, they either refuse to believe it or seek to excuse it.

The effrontery of some of these officials in trying to help Hiss escape justice has been beyond the bounds of ethical procedure. But what of the unconvicted Hisses? It is the solemn duty of the Congress, with its far-reaching powers, to resolutely investigate and bring to the bar of justice and compel them to face the obloquy their acts have brought down upon them. As I said many years ago in connection with the New York State Legislature, it is the duty of a legislature not only to make the laws but to investigate to determine the effectiveness of such laws, to see if these laws are doing the job that was intended. The Hiss conviction is good—a much-needed start on the regulation and punishment of those who seek to betray their country. His fangs have been pulled, but we must continue ceaseless quest to pull those of other vipers who have been nursing at our bosoms.

Let us find out who is responsible for these conditions which have been so properly mentioned here today. Who are they?

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

FRIDAY, JANUARY 27, 1950

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Our Father, we mingle our praying breath with these timeless words: Praise God from whom all blessings flow. We thank Thee that nothing seen or unseen can separate us from Thy divine love.

Blessed Lord, make plain the path of duty that we may understand that life needs the discipline of work to make it great and good. O give us the faith that shall bear unmoved the cares of toil, and shall murmur not when the chastening rod is heavy. Look with mercy upon our historic institutions and blot out all strife, all antagonisms, and all factions which threaten our social order and the stability of our people.

"Whenever man oppresses man beneath the liberal sun,
O Lord, be there; Thine arm make bare;
Thy righteous will be done."

For the sake of Him who became poor that we might become rich. Amen.

There was no objection.

PERMISSION TO EXTEND REMARKS AT THIS POINT

Mr. BIEMILLER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks at this point in the RECORD and include a telegram.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Wisconsin?

There was no objection.

Mr. BIEMILLER. Mr. Speaker, I have received a telegraphic message of vital importance. It comes from one of America's most distinguished educators, Dr. Robert Maynard Hutchins, of the University of Chicago. This is its text:

As chancelor of the University of Chicago and chairman of the Committee on Federal Aid to Medical Schools of the American Association of Universities, I want to bear urgent witness to the critical and immediate need of the medical schools of this country. President Conant's recent statement on the precarious financial condition of Harvard Medical and Public Health Schools is applicable in my opinion to every school in the country training personnel for the professions concerned with health. The cost of providing instruction of high quality for doctors and other medical personnel far exceeds the funds available from tuition and other sources.

Without operating funds, schools will be unable to maintain current enrollments—already dangerously low—and improve present standards of instruction. Public support in the form of Federal funds is essential if schools are to fulfill their public responsibility, providing enough well-trained personnel to meet the health needs of the Nation. Whatever action may be taken on any other aspect of providing adequate health services, the country cannot afford to let existing shortages of trained health personnel increase in severity. I therefore urge your efforts toward prompt passage of H. R. 5940, feeling convinced that in its present form the bill affords adequate protection of academic and administrative freedom while providing reasonable control of the expenditure of public funds.

The signature is that of Dr. Hutchins, a man noted for disinterest in the unnecessary.

This telegram, it seems to me, is final testimony to the irresistible pressure building up in the medical schools of this country. The statement of President Conant, of Harvard, to which Dr. Hutchins refers, is a cry for help from a university that is among the Nation's richest and best endowed. Each one of you know how much more desperate is the plight of the medical schools in your own States.

The distinguished gentlemen from Michigan know what is happening at Wayne, Michigan State, and the University of Michigan. Every Massachusetts Representative must know the dire straits of the schools there. This is a universal and far-reaching problem, one that goes not only to the present welfare of our great medical schools but to the health and well-being of America's citizens of today and tomorrow.

AMENDING AGRICULTURAL ADJUSTMENT ACT OF 1938

Mr. LYLE. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on Rules I call up House Resolution 451 and ask for its immediate consideration.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That immediately upon the adoption of this resolution it shall be in order to move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union for the consideration of the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 398) relating to cotton and peanut acreage allotments and marketing quotas under the Agricultural Adjustment Act of 1938, as amended. That after general debate, which shall be confined to the bill and continue not to exceed 3 hours, to be equally divided and controlled by the chairman and ranking minority member of the Committee on Agriculture, the joint resolution shall be read for amendment under the 5-minute rule. At the conclusion of the consideration of the joint resolution for amendment, the Committee shall rise and report the joint resolution to the House with such amendments as may have been adopted and the previous question shall be considered as ordered on the joint resolution and amendments thereto to final passage without intervening motion except one motion to recommit.

Mr. LYLE. Mr. Speaker, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BROWN], and at this time yield myself 6 minutes.

Mr. Speaker, House Resolution 451 makes in order the immediate consideration of House Joint Resolution 398, a joint resolution from the Committee on Agriculture relating to cotton- and peanut-acreage allotments. Its immediate consideration and enactment are necessary and of great importance to the Nation.

This resolution does not propose new legislation. It simply seeks to accomplish what good administration would have done without additional legislation—give the farmer a fair deal. It seeks to put back into the law what has been deleted by either a complete misunderstanding by the administrators or utter disregard of the intent and letter of the law and its proper application.

It was never the intention of Congress that inequities and hardships should follow the enactment of the quota law. It was passed to insure a reduction in cotton production, to insure a minimum surplus, and a fair and reasonable price. The cut, as provided in Public Law 272 was about 7,000,000 acres. Had such a cut been fairly and evenly distributed, there could have been little legitimate complaint. The cut was not fairly and evenly distributed. A Nation-wide reduction of about 23 percent is not evenly distributed when thousands of farmers are forced, under the terms of Public Law 272, to cut their cotton acreage 80 to 90 percent. A cotton farmer who has been planting 300 acres to cotton annually has not received his fair share when allocated 57 acres for 1950. Not only can he not eat or live under such terms but he will lose his equity in his land and must turn away his tenants, his partners in business.

A law, any law, which forces thousands upon thousands to suffer the hardship of hunger and bankruptcy can hardly be justified. This amendment will most certainly relieve many of such an unbearable hardship.

House Joint Resolution 398 provides for the allocation of additional acreage—approximately 1,400,000—to the cotton farmers of America. It is a 1-year emergency measure calculated to correct gross inequities and hardships which have arisen from the administration of the cotton quota law—Public Law 272—enacted last August.

The resolution provides that cotton farmers shall have a cotton-acreage allotment of no less than 70 percent of the average planted in 1946–47–48, including war crops, to cotton, or 50 percent of the highest planted in any one of such years.

There is a proviso to limit the allotment to not to exceed 40 percent of the acreage on such farms which are tilled annually or in regular rotation. It further provides authority for the redistribution of allocated acreage which is not planted and is voluntarily surrendered by the owner or operator of the farm. The resolution also provides small additional acreage for peanuts.

The establishment of quotas results in hardships under the most favorable circumstances, but it is particularly harsh at this time. The cost of production for the farmer is at an all-time high. The prices he pays for all that he buys are well above parity. At a time when the hourly wage of the Nation goes up by virtue of a Federal law, the income of the farmer unfortunately is falling by virtue of a Federal law.

The application of Public Law 272, as interpreted and administered, has resulted in severe—unduly severe—hardships. These are actual, not imaginary, hardships.

It surely must cause many of you who have not been closely associated with this problem to wonder why we find ourselves faced with this difficulty. The excellent report filed by the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. COOLEY] to accompany House Joint Resolution 398 discusses the factors involved. There are many, namely: lack of accurate information on acreage planted during past years; lack of experienced farmer-administrators at the county level; and, in my personal judgment, a complete misunderstanding or disregard by the Department of Agriculture of the intent of Congress in enacting Public Law 272.

With few exceptions, the farmers—the victims—were not in any respect at fault in this tragic mix-up. But no matter the villain, this amendment will permit any farmer whose acreage is below the minimum, irrespective of the reason, to be brought up to the 70–50 minimum, limited by 40 percent of his acreage which is tilled annually or in regular rotation. As the committee report so ably says:

> The additional acreage which may be required for this act of simple justice will be a small price for the Nation to pay for continuation and vindication of the principle that sound soil-conservation practices shall be considered in the allotment of quotas.

The problems involved are peculiar to the Cotton Belt, but the effects are not confined to regions alone. The entire Nation feels the pinch on agricultural income. This is not a bill to benefit only the cotton States. No part of the Nation can fail to benefit by its enactment. No part of the Nation can but suffer if it fails in passage. While no one can rightfully say that it will cost the Government a single penny, it can be said with all certainty that it is a measure to add more than a billion dollars to the agricultural income—income that will be spent for the products and goods of America, in every State in the Union.

It means added business for the constituents of all of you. It means food, shelter, and clothing for those of thousands of us.

I earnestly request your support of this rule and this bill. You and your people live in partnership with the farmer. His prosperity is yours; his poverty you share. No politics is involved, only cold economics. This Congress is conscious of the truth that millions of the jobs of nonfarm workers are directly dependent upon billions of farm income. It would be reassuring to the Nation to see an overwhelmingly favorable vote on this measure. The rule provides for ample debate and for any germane amendment.

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LYLE. I yield.

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. The gentleman stated that if the Department had carried out the quota law as it was intended to be carried out by the committee and the Congress that we would not have had this difficulty. I wish the gentleman would, if he can, explain wherein they have failed to carry out the intent of the Congress.

Mr. LYLE. I would be very happy to do so, but I made a rather lengthy statement on the floor of the House on February 6, which I would like for the gentleman to read, if he would. I went into it at some length, and it would take about 20 minutes to do that.

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. I did read it, of course, and I know about it, but I thought for the benefit of the House the gentleman would like to do that now.

Mr. LYLE. I am afraid it would take a little while, but I shall take it up in general debate.

CALL OF THE HOUSE

Mr. BIEMILLER. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that a quorum is not present.

The SPEAKER. Evidently a quorum is not present.

Mr. GORE. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

AMENDING AGRICULTURAL ADJUSTMENT ACT OF 1938

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, as the gentleman from Texas [Mr. LYLE] has explained, House Resolution 451 makes in order House Joint Resolution 398, with 3 hours of general debate.

The measure has been reported from the Committee on Agriculture, after some emergency sessions and hearings, to relieve a situation that has developed as a result of the so-called trial run of the 1949 Agricultural Act. I know of no opposition to the rule on this side of the House.

Mr. Speaker, I yield 1 minute to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GAVIN].

Mr. GAVIN. Mr. Speaker, Mr. Dean Acheson has the right, as an individual, to his own personal viewpoint. But as Secretary of State and a public official, I think he has made a grave and serious error in publicly expressing himself as he did on the Alger Hiss case.

His sympathy for Hiss evidences his thinking and Dean Acheson by his public pronouncement has forfeited his right to continue in this high office of Government as our Secretary of State representing the American people.

Therefore, in view of the fact, that his thinking is contrary to the wishes of the American people, he has lost any confidence and value he has had as our Secretary of State and his resignation is in order.

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN].

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. Mr. Speaker, on January 17, I called the attention of the House to a coal-shortage situation in Minnesota and the Northwest. I urged the President to take immediate action to restore coal production in order to relieve suffering of American citizens who are short of fuel under cold subtemperature conditions. The President has refused to act. He states that no emergency exists, although his chief of the Bureau of Mines advises that the situation is critical.

Mr. Speaker, the coal-supply situation in many communities in my congressional district has become extremely critical. The emergency is here and the people in need of coal cannot understand the reason for the failure of the President to act. He is the only official who has the authority to act with dispatch. I fully understand and recognize, Mr. Speaker, as you stated last Friday, that President Truman won the last election and secured a Democratic Congress. I concede that he won the election. But that does not give him any right to play politics with human misery and suffering.

I have had several long-distance telephone calls within the past 24 hours from citizens in various communities in my district telling me about the coal shortage. The temperature last night at Rochester, Minn., went down to 27° below zero. I made a survey today in Rochester, which most of you know is a medical center, and found that of the 36 hotels in that city, about half of them are virtually out of stoker coal. These hotels are mainly used by sick people from all parts of the world, who have come to the Mayo Clinic for treatment. They must have warm rooms in the present subzero weather and it takes coal to provide the heat.

I checked with the coal dealers in Rochester and found they only had 12 tons of stoker coal on hand today. They have two carloads of coal on the way, but there is uncertainty when it will arrive from the coal fields of Illinois, and this small quantity will only last 2 days, if rationed out.

Something must be done, and the President of the United States is the only one that can do it. If he does not recognize that there is an emergency, I can assure him that there is a critical emergency in my congressional district and elsewhere in the Northwest, where they are now having subzero temperatures. In other communities they are also short of stoker coal. Our schools in some sections will be closed down by February 1 unless coal is received. That is true of Northfield, Minn. In other areas many families will be without coal within a few days.

If the President has inherent powers under the Constitution that he desires to exercise, instead of functioning under the law passed by the Congress, then he should exercise that power to get people back to work in the coal mines to produce in full production so as to save the people in this country from the suffering and misery which will occur as the result of these coal shortages.

The time to act is now, before it is too late. I again call upon the President of the United States to function in his executive capacity in accordance with the Constitution, because we are in need. If he does not act immediately he will have to take the consequences.

Mr. LYLE. Mr. Speaker, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SABATH].

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, the able gentleman from Texas who brought about the favorable action on this rule in the Committee on Rules has explained the bill. Consequently I do not think it is necessary for me to explain the rule or elaborate on the bill. However, I am obliged to call attention to some significant and important facts relative thereto.

The resolution before us was introduced on January 21, and the request for a rule was made before the Committee on Agriculture had a printed bill.

The bill came in while the committee was in session; the ink was still wet. At the same time, the lengthy report on this resolution was brought in while the Committee on Rules was in session considering the rule now before us. Of course, due to conditions which prevail in the Committee on Rules and due to the persistence of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. LYLE]—and I do not blame him because he claims there are some inequities as to the allocations of acreage—he expressed the desire to bring about equity and justice to those who have been discriminated against in the allocation of cotton acreages.

Consequently I feel he performed his duty as he saw it, and expressed the point of view of his constituents. But right here I wish to say, if there were any discrepancies or if anyone has suffered, it was not due to the Congress, because we passed a bill last year upon the recommendation of many capable gentlemen on the Committee on Agriculture, to allegedly alleviate the then existing inequalities.

Now, a rule has been granted upon the persistence and insistence of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. LYLE] and others, notwithstanding that we had pending an application for a rule for over a period of 3 years on the FEPC—the Fair Employment Practice Commission bill. For 4 weeks I have been endeavoring to my very utmost to secure a rule on it. By everything that is right, that rule had precedence.

But, due to a coalition and a friendly understanding on the part of some of the gentlemen from the South, the West, and some of my Republican reactionary friends who seem to cooperate and have been able to cooperate with them, a rule was granted without even giving me a chance to read the bill or read the report, as I said before. Of course, one of the gentlemen said that I would not understand it anyway, because it was a complicated resolution.

Oh, I did read it and examine it, and I understand it and I know what it means.

Mr. Speaker, the American people will wonder, and have a right to wonder, about the insincerity of the Republicans, who, day in and day out, preach economy and complain of the huge public debt and not only oppose but vote for these additional millions of dollars that will be saddled on the backs of the taxpayers.

However, I myself understand the underlying reason, it being that the coalition between the Republicans and Dixiecrats is working, and God help the country if it continues in force. The Republicans voted with the Dixiecrats for the increase of 1,400,000 acres of cotton in return for their votes against FEPC. That is obvious.

They feel they can hide or cover up the duplicity and double-dealing, but I feel that notwithstanding their ingenuity and ability to distort facts, they will be unable to make it stick.

The additional tax burden involved in this cotton-acreage increase will inure to the benefit of 11 States, 5 of which have alined themselves with the so-called Dixiecrat Party—States like Alabama, Georgia, Texas, Arkansas, and South Carolina.

Mr. Speaker, indeed we do have some big cotton planters, because only in yesterday's paper I read of one cotton planter who sold his 1949 crop for $1,400,000. Surely he and other large operators were not discriminated against.

I have been informed that the committee is working on a so-called permanent program—that this is only for the year 1950—so I felt this matter should go over until they were ready to present their permanent program. They demanded immediate action, naturally feeling that the less the membership knew about the great cost involved in this bill, the easier it would be for them to pass it. It is indeed strange that these gentlemen, urging and forcing this legislation, which assures them six or seven times as great a price for cotton as they received under a Republican administration, and though they get six to seven times more for their crops today, oppose at all times any wage increases to our workingmen. Their claim is that labor is receiving from 50 to 100 percent greater wages than before. However, we did force through this House the minimum-wage bill.

Oh, the inconsistency! I repeat—what inconsistency and unfairness on their part.

Though the Democratic Party, under the leadership of Franklin Delano Roosevelt, and now under President Truman, through progressive legislation, brought about the greatest prosperity our country has ever enjoyed—especially to the South—prosperity they never dreamed could be theirs—they thrive upon opposition to the President's program and policies for more liberal legislation; and this in violation of the Jeffersonian concept of equal rights to all and special privileges to none.

Mr. Speaker, for 42 years I voted for every agricultural bill. No one can justly charge me with prejudice or that I have not had the interest of the farmer and agriculture at heart or that I am prejudiced against the cotton grower. Why, I recollect that due to the tremendous surplus of cotton which accumulated during Republican regimes, when cotton could not be sold at 4½ cents or 5 cents a pound, I purchased, not for profit but to aid the growers, 500 bales of cotton, notwithstanding the fact that no cotton was grown in my district or in my State.

Personally I feel that the Department of Agriculture, which has done so much for the farmer these last 18 years, should have been given an opportunity to adjust the discrepancies in allotments—taking away from the huge operators, who farm from 1,000 acres and up, the small amount necessary to do justice to the operators who have been unfairly treated by the county and State organizations.

Mr. COOLEY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SABATH. I yield.

Mr. COOLEY. Now that the gentleman does understand it and knows what it means, I am sure he will be willing to support it?

Mr. SABATH. Well, it is not as bad as the first bill that you introduced. It is for 1 year. My objection is not as great to this, but I object to the haste with which it has been forced through the committee, notwithstanding other important legislation in which a vast majority of the American people are interested. The FEPC bill has been sidetracked under one pretense or another for the last 4 weeks, and this bill given priority as I said previously. That is what I object to. The unfair tactics and agreements that seem to be had between you gentlemen representing some of the cotton States and your Republican friends—you, yourself, are all right once in a while. You vote with us. But very few of the others do.

Mr. Speaker, as I said before, and to make the RECORD factual, the gentleman from North Carolina, Chairman COOLEY, appeared before the Committee on Rules, Thusday morning, and informed the committee that he had received a letter from the Acting Secretary of Agriculture, Mr. K. T. Hutchinson, under date of January 26, 1950, stating that—

> On the basis that the reported resolution is an emergency measure for 1 year only designed to authorize the correction of certain gross inequities which have resulted from the application of the provisions of Public Laws 272 and 439, Eighty-first Congress, the Department is in favor of its enactment.

The reference is to the bill presently before us, namely, House Joint Resolution 398.

Now then the able chairman of the Committee on Agriculture, although reading the first paragraph of the letter above referred to, has failed to point out what the Acting Secretary of Agriculture had to say with reference to the undesirable provisions of this joint resolution. Yes, the Department of Agriculture is in favor of the enactment of this joint resolution. However, they also state that their recommendation is based "on an understanding that you intend to reconsider Public Law 272 with the object in mind of rewriting the cotton-acreage-allotment provision of the law in a manner which will not require similar emergency measures in the future. The history of emergency amendments for correcting inequitable cotton-acreage allotments is that the additional acreage alloted is always over and above the amounts considered necessary for proper adjustments of supplies to demand."

In connection with further less desirable provisions of the joint resolution, the Acting Secretary of Agriculture calls attention to section 2, providing for farmers who have allotments in excess of what they desire to plant in 1950 to voluntarily surrender such allotments to the county committee for reapportionment to other farms in the county. The Acting Secretary states that this will not actually reduce the amount of cotton that would be otherwise planted in 1950. He states that the provisions of section 1 "will give all farmers who request it the larger of 70 percent of the 3-year average acreage planted or regarded as planted to cotton or 50 percent of the highest acreage planted or regarded as planted to cotton in any one of such 3 years, even though no acreage is surrendered by other farmers in the county. The counties that will benefit the most from surrender and reapportionment of unused cotton-acreage allotments are those counties which have the most generous allotments in relation to the acreage of cotton which is being currently planted in such counties."

Thus, the Acting Secretary states, counties and States in which little or no acreage would be released or reapportioned under section 2 will be at a disadvantage to those in which considerable acreage is released and reapportioned since the acreage so released and reapportioned would be used in establishing future State and county cotton-acreage allotments. "This could lead to major problems in the future in establishing State and county allotments." But the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. COOLEY] failed to read this part of Mr. Hutchinson's statement to the committee on Thursday.

The Acting Secretary of Agriculture plainly stated that additional acreage of at least 1,400,000 acres would be allotted under the provisions of section 1 of this bill, as I pointed out before:

> The estimated additional cost represented by additional CCC loans ranges from $90,000,000 to $120,000,000. The estimated additional cost in connection with the administration and application of this resolution is $2,000,000.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, when one reads from a letter he should state all the provisions contained therein, since the Department of Agriculture is not wholeheartedly in favor of this legislation. In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I wish to state to my colleagues who have not fully cooperated in the passage of liberal and progressive legislation recommended by President Truman and the administration, that if they continue to pursue their unholy alliance and coalition with the Republicans, surely the people of the country will react in the forthcoming elections by electing a Democratic majority in fact and not in name only.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. HERTER. Mr. Speaker, I yield 1 minute to the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. CURTIS].

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. Speaker, the conviction of Alger Hiss renews one's appreciation of the American system with its independent judiciary. Americans are grateful for independent courts and fearless and courageous prosecutors.

The conviction of Alger Hiss is a conviction of a great many men in high places, both living and dead, who have steered this Nation in the course designed by our enemies.

The sad state of affairs in the world today is the result of Communist strategy within our Government.

We need a Secretary of State whose first and only loyalty is to the United States of America.

Mr. HERTER. Mr. Speaker, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. SHAFER].

Mr. SHAFER. Mr. Speaker, I have here a letter from the Member from New York, ADAM CLAYTON POWELL, which I shall read in part:

> MY DEAR COLLEAGUE: I have filed Discharge Petition No. 21. On Wednesday, January 25, 1950, at 12 o'clock noon or as soon thereafter as possible, I will read on the floor the names of those Republicans who indicate that they will or will not sign Discharge Petition No. 21 to discharge my FEPC bill, H. R. 4453.
> Failure to reply to this letter will indicate that you are opposed to FEPC. I will so note on the floor next week. Therefore, kindly reply before 11 a. m., Wednesday, February 1, 1950. * * *
> You may use the enclosed post card or call my office.

I assume, Mr. Speaker, that identical letters have been sent to all Republican Members. I do not know how they feel about this assumption of power by the Member from New York, but I resent it. I had given some thought to signing this petition but this letter has definitely changed my mind. Certainly the gentleman from New York [Mr. POWELL] does not exhibit the tolerance that should be expected from a man who seeks legislation which he claims will promote tolerance and better understanding among races.

Mr. MASON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHAFER. In just a minute.

This high-and-mighty attitude hardly befits the gentleman from New York [Mr. POWELL] as a Member of Congress or as a minister of the Gospel. If I read the Good Book correctly, we should not judge others too harshly or take unto ourselves all the virtues in existence. I want to say emphatically that the gentleman from New York [Mr. POWELL] shall not speak for me on FEPC or any other issue.

I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. MASON. My answer to him was "No," and I signed my name to it.

Mr. SHAFER. My answer to it was to file it in the vertical file, if you know what I mean.

Mr. HERTER. Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BECKWORTH].

Mr. BECKWORTH. Mr. Speaker, I am very grateful for this time.

Mr. Speaker, there has been a lot of misunderstanding about how the little farmer is taken care of. I have heard time and time again, and some of my colleagues tell me likewise, that there is a 5-acre minimum. This just is not the case. I ask you to listen to a colloquy that took place on August 3, 1949, when the bill came before the House, a colloquy between the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. PACE], who is an authority on this matter, and me:

Mr. BECKWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask some of the Members who are sponsoring this bill this question. It is in the form of an assumption, but I think a very real assumption.

Assume that a veteran 25 or 26 years of age never did anything except grow cotton on a cotton farm until 1942 when he went into the Army; assume he remained in the Army until 1946; assume that he took GI training to be a mechanic for 2 years and while doing so he did not farm; assume that he owns a 60-acre cotton farm which has had no cotton on it since 1942; assume that today he loses his job and goes back to that cotton farm which has not had cotton grown on it since 1942. The question is: Will he be privileged to get 5 acres of cotton?

Mr. PACE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BECKWORTH. I yield.

Mr. PACE. That depends, and I have tried to explain it to the gentleman, that depends entirely upon the State PMA Committee of the State of Texas, and the county PMA committee in which that farm is located. He can, and will very likely get considerably more than 5 acres. It depends upon the amount of acreage the State committee allocates to that county for new farms. If the State committee gives the county, for example, 500 acres for new farms, every acre of it must go to new farms. Then, in addition to that 500 acres, the county committee may reserve 10 percent that can be used for new farms. So the allotment could be identical with like farms in the same area.

Mr. BECKWORTH. May I ask this further question: However, is it true or is it not true that the definite 5-acre minimum applies to him?

Mr. PACE. It does not.

The bill that we passed on August 3 did not provide for a 5-acre minimum for a genuine cotton farmer, as the man I have described, for one who grew cotton until 1942 at which time he owned a cotton farm and entered the service. It does not provide a 5-acre minimum and the record does not so show.

Mr. Speaker, the time is at hand when we should try to be fair to the small farmer, the man who is out there trying to feed his family and trying to make a decent, honest living. If any kind of control bill does not take care of that person in a fair and square manner, the bill is not just, the bill is not sound in that respect, because in my judgment, it cannot endure.

I trust that the Members of the House in their deliberations concerning this important measure will undertake to be fair to the kind of veteran I have referred to, a man 26 years of age who grew cotton, for example, until 1942 but did not have the privilege of growing it again until, we shall assume, 1949.

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BECKWORTH. I yield to the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. The gentleman has stated that existing law does not provide for a minimum of 5 acres for a farmer; is that correct?

Mr. BECKWORTH. For the kind of cotton farmer I have described.

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. One who has been in the service and came out.

Mr. BECKWORTH. Yes. The cotton acreage law means if you were not on the farm in 1946, 1947, and 1948, regardless of whether you never did a thing in the world except grow cotton before and since, you are classified as a new cotton farmer. Yes, you are told you are a new farmer. You are new like a lawyer Member of Congress who serves in Congress for 10 years would be a new lawyer if it were written into the law that such a Member of Congress would be regarded as a new lawyer rather than an old lawyer, because of his service in Congress and therefore his being away from the practice of law.

Mr. POAGE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BECKWORTH. I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. POAGE. If the gentleman should be defeated, no matter how long he had been a Member of Congress, he would not remain a Member of Congress for 3 years after his defeat, and a man who quits farming cotton does not remain a cotton farmer just because he may have grown cotton at sometime in the past. I think we are quite liberal in this cotton law as we consider a man a cotton farmer for three full years after he quits growing cotton.

Mr. BECKWORTH. Does the gentleman regard himself as a lawyer? Does he think he should be privileged to practice law when he goes back to Waco whether he is defeated or not?

Mr. POAGE. I may go back to the practice of law if I am defeated, but certainly I am not practicing law now, and do not hold myself out as a lawyer. I am a Member of Congress now. Surely at any given date a man cannot claim to be engaged in every trade, profession, or business in which he may have at one time or another engaged.

Mr. BECKWORTH. Would the gentleman be a new lawyer?

Mr. POAGE. Yes, I am afraid I would be a new lawyer were I to try to go back to the practice. I would be without clients just as the man who has not grown cotton for 14 years is without a cotton allotment.

Mr. BECKWORTH. That may be the gentleman's conception of businesses and occupations in this country. I submit that just because a fellow has been in business, we shall say, as a merchant for 20 years, gets out and remains out 3 years, this does not mean he is not a merchant or businessman. I submit that a man who has been a dentist we shall say for 20 years and ceases to be for 3 years is no reason why he is not still a dentist and I believe my colleagues here accord to that statement fairness.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. LYLE. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the resolution.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

COTTON- AND PEANUT-ACREAGE ALLOTMENTS AND MARKETING QUOTAS

Mr. COOLEY. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union for the consideration of House Joint Resolution 398, relating to cotton- and peanut-acreage allotments and marketing quotas under the Agricultural Adjustment Act of 1938, as amended.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union for the consideration of House Joint Resolution 398, relating to cotton- and peanut-acreage allotments and marketing quotas under the Agricultural Adjustment Act of 1938, as amended, with Mr. SMITH of Virginia in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

By unanimous consent, the first reading of the bill was dispensed with.

The CHAIRMAN. Under the rule the gentleman from North Carolina will be recognized for 1½ hours, and the gentleman from Minnesota for 1½ hours.

The gentleman from North Carolina is recognized.

Mr. COOLEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BECKWORTH].

Mr. BECKWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I wonder if the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN] could give me any additional time? I would like to have a little more than 5 minutes, if possible.

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. I can tell the gentleman a little later.

Mr. BECKWORTH. Mr. Chairman, in August last year when this bill came before the Congress I very definitely stated it was not a bill which would work equitably for many people in the business of growing cotton. I remember very definitely it was stated that the bill had been unanimously reported by the subcommittee, that it had been unanimously reported by the full committee and that it was the desire of the group that it be undisturbed. It was not disturbed although several of us did offer several amendments. The gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. WICKERSHAM] and I offered certain amendments; however, the bill remained undisturbed. At this point I desire to pay particular tribute to the gentlemen from Oklahoma [Mr. WICKERSHAM] for the great amount of time and effort he has given the subjects of cotton, wheat, and corn crops. His service on the Agriculture Committee in conjunction with his sincere interest in the welfare of Oklahoma and United States farmers has put him in a position to fully understand the problems of our farmers. He has had the vision and courage to try to do something about their plight as has been shown in the past by his offering amendments last August 3 when the cotton bill passed the House.

I have never been one to forecast, but, in my opinion, if it is not disturbed more than it has been disturbed by the amendments that are before us today, it will have to be disturbed some more in the future because it still lacks a great deal so far as helping many people who need help in the worst way, and as they should be helped. I am not trying to place the blame on anybody. I have never been a person who tries to blame anyone, but I do believe in endeavoring to bring about corrections.

I read with much interest a letter that the Department of Agriculture, signed by Secretary Brannan, wrote to the gentleman from New York [Mr. KLEIN]. He indicated the Farm Bureau wrote the bill and that the Department of Agriculture did not want to take credit for it. To me that was a very peculiar position for the Department of Agriculture to take. If the Department of Agriculture had been trying very hard to change the original bill, the one passed August 3, it is inconceivable to me that there would have been a unanimous report by the full Committee on Agriculture. It is inconceivable to me that the Department of Agriculture fighting the bill could not have gotten one member of the Committee on Agriculture to oppose the bill actively on the floor of the House, certainly to the point of advocating correction. So I do not attach too much significance to the fact that the Department of Agriculture did not have a great deal to do with the writing of this bill. Indeed, if the Department opposed the bill, it was very quietly.

Mr. Chairman, when you control crops you are in fact controlling income. Make no mistake about that. We are in fact controlling the income from the crops controlled. The only way, then, that a program of income control has a chance to endure is for it to be fair.

According to a study the Census Bureau made some 10 years ago, seven-eighths of the cotton farmers was getting 50 percent of the cotton income and one-eighth was getting the other 50 percent. Let me repeat that according to a census study back in 1940, announced a little later, seven-eighths of the cotton farmers was getting 50 percent of the cotton income and one-eighth was getting 50 percent. If the facts could be ascertained now, I believe it would be considerably worse. I hope not. I repeat again, in a controlled crop program the thing that we all should strive for is fairness.

Another factor that has not had the consideration it deserves, as I view it, is the fact that there has been a great war since 1942, a war that disrupted many agricultural areas including mine. I will tell you how much it disrupted my area. We live for example not far from Texarkana, Tex., where there was located a giant ordnance plant during the war, and it is still there. Many of our people went to that plant to work. I wrote to officials at Texarkana recently and asked them how many fewer jobs they have there now than they had at the height of their employment. I was informed some 7,500.

We hear a lot about trends. There is one trend, though, that has not been mentioned frequently. There has been a trend away from the farm, but since the war was over there has been a trend back to the farm.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman three additional minutes.

Mr. BECKWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I repeat, there was a trend away from the farms, and then there was a trend back to the farms, and many of these people, home owners, some of them have come back—and I have letters that I have put in the RECORD from time to time—only to find that they have little or no acreage allotment. They are even allocating some of my people nine-tenths of 1 acre of poor land. That is in the RECORD, too. That is nine-tenths of 1 acre, not 9 acres, but nine-tenths of 1 acre of poor land.

Another very interesting word that is often used is the word "reserve." You know it sounds awfully good but reserve can have a peculiar meaning or implication. If I have a penny in my pocket I have a reserve, and if I have $100,000 I have a reserve. The important thing is whether or not the reserve is adequate, and in most of the counties in the section where I live, or in many of them, I should say, the reserve was completely inadequate, so inadequate that in one county, for example, which is not in my district, according to a letter that is in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, they have 1,000 farms with three-hundred-and-some-odd acres to distribute between them, and yet you have a reserve of three-hundred-and-some-odd acres. According to this bill, and I have seen the figures, not many more acres, proportionately, will that county receive. It still has a reserve, but the adequacy of that reserve certainly is questionable.

There are two ways to put people off of the farm. One is not to give the fellow any allotment, and the other is to give him such a small allotment that he cannot stay on the farm. A good many people in my section are getting allotments so small that it will be impossible to stay on the farm if the letters I am receiving are correct—letters which are in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

I want to bring one important issue to you right there. You drive 400 fellows from the farm because of the inadequacy of the allotment, and then see if they can vote on the cotton referendum this fall. The answer is that they cannot, being driven away from the vocations that they want to follow, vocations they have followed throughout the years, excepting the war period and the lease period—the three basic years—yes, vocations they have followed throughout their lives. I repeat, they cannot vote in the cotton referendum this fall.

Mr. Chairman, I desire to include certain communications I have received in regard to cotton:

HON. LINDLEY BECKWORTH,

DEAR MR. BECKWORTH: I am returning to you herewith the material on the cotton county estimates and cotton allotments for Missouri.

You are advised that I have not received a copy of the Cooley amendment and the Production and Marketing Administration officials state that they have not made an attempt to make calculations under this amendment by counties since there is still question as to what the final law will be. However, I am of the opinion that the amendment would raise the Missouri cotton allotment from some 25,000 to 50,000 acres.

Mr. LINDLEY BECKWORTH,
Congress of the United States,

DEAR SIR: Our PMA cotton committee reserved the full amount in our county. Your amendment would not help our county allotments any. The only legislation that would help us would be an amendment giving us power to transfer unused allotments over to cotton farmers who would use this allotment.

Very truly yours,

WILLIAM W. MANSFIELD,

Hon. LINDLEY BECKWORTH,
Member of Congress,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: This is to reply to your letter of January 16, 1950, requesting information on the establishment of cotton allotments in Le Flore County, Okla.

The county and community committees reserved the maximum 15 percent and used it for upward adjustments. The enclosed amendment which you send us would give Le Flore County 680 acres additional allotment if based on BAE figures. The BAE figures in this county were only 60 percent of the farmers' reported acres. This amendment would add considerable acreage if based on farmers' reported acreage. It is estimated that 1,000 additional acres is needed in this county to prevent hardships on genuine cotton farmers and tenants.

It is estimated from our contact with farmers that more than 1,000 acres would be released and could be reapportioned.

Yours very truly,

A. H. MILLER,
Chairman, Le Flore County PMA Committee.

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE,

Stigler, Okla., January 20, 1950.

Re Haskell County, Okla.

Hon. LINDLEY BECKWORTH,
Member of Congress,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: The Haskell County committee held the maximum reserve of 15 percent of the county allotment for adjustments. It is our opinion that the county committee could have done a better job of distribution had they been permitted to have held even more.

The proposed 70 percent of the 3-year-average amendment would give this county some 650 additional acres. This acreage will not be of any great help because it would not fall on farms where the real problem exists. Having had to conform with BEA acreages for the base years eliminates any substantial help on the 70-percent basis.

Fifty percent of the high-planted year, 1946, 1947, 1948, would add some 1,200 acres to our county allotment. The greater portion of these acres would reach farms which have been rather heavily cut.

What we should most prefer for our county needs would be the privilege of releasing and reapportioning existing cotton acreage in this county. We have no criticism to offer for the allotment that has been given to the county. What we most need is a flexible method of distribution.

Our 1942 cotton allotment was 19,000-plus acres. Our 1950 cotton allotment is 11,000-plus acres.

We appreciate your concern of the marketing-quota problems, and shall gladly and promptly answer any inquiry you might make of us.

Yours very truly,

WM. HARDIE CABLER,
County Administrative Officer.

Hon. LINDLEY BECKWORTH,

Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. BECKWORTH: Reference is made to your letter of January 17 from Mr. John A. Cariker, of Long Branch, Tex. Mr. Cariker had requested your assistance in securing a larger allotment for his farm.

Under existing cotton legislation there is nothing that we can do here or in the county office to increase the farm allotment. Amendatory legislation now being considered by the Congress will, no doubt, increase his farm allotment as we expect such legislation to increase many farm allotments in all counties in the State.

Very truly yours,

B. F. VANCE,

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE,
PRODUCTION AND MARKETING ADMINISTRATION,
College Station, Tex., January 23, 1950.
Hon. LINDLEY BECKWORTH,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. BECKWORTH: This will reply to your letter of January 16 with which you enclosed a copy of a letter from Mr. Hubert W. Peden, Edgewood, Tex. Mr. Peden had complained about a 1950 cotton allotment for his farm and also stated that he and many other farmers in his community were not permitted to vote in the cotton marketing quota referendum held on December 15, 1949.

As I understand Mr. Peden's letter, he had not produced cotton on his farm in 1946, 1947, or 1948 and there was no indication that cotton war crops were produced instead of cotton in 1946 or 1947. Consequently, under existing legislation the county committee could not establish a group I or regular farm cotton allotment. Mr. Peden should apply to his county committee for a group II or new farm cotton allotment as soon as possible. We expect to complete the determination of new farm cotton allotments around March 1, after which time he will be notified.

Section 343 of the Agricultural Adjustment Act of 1938, as amended by Public Law 272, Eighty-first Congress, provides that if marketing quotas are proclaimed for the 1950 crop (of cotton) farmers eligible to vote in the referendum held with respect to such crop shall be those farmers who were engaged in the production of cotton in the calendar year of 1948. This requirement of law, of course, resulted in Mr. Peden's being ineligible to vote in the referendum as he did not produce cotton in 1948, and his local referendum committee was correct in refusing to permit him, as well as others in the community who did not produce cotton in 1948, to cast a ballot.

Very truly yours,

B. F. VANCE,
Chairman, State Committee.

Hon. LINDLEY BECKWORTH,

DEAR MR. BECKWORTH: This will reply to your letter of January 17, 1950, in which you quoted a portion of a letter from Mr. O. H. Moseley, of route 1, Ben Wheeler, Tex. We also have your note of January 21 with reference to a copy of a letter from K. T. Hutchinson, Assistant Secretary of Agriculture, to you regarding Mr. Moseley's eligibility to vote in the referendum. Mr. Moseley had complained about the cotton-acreage allotment for his farm and also that he was not permitted to vote in the cotton-marketing-quota referendum conducted on December 15, 1949.

As I understand Mr. Moseley's letter, he had not produced cotton on his farm in 1946, 1947, or 1948, and there was no indication that war crops were produced instead of cotton in 1946 or 1947. Consequently, under existing legislation the county committee could not establish a group I or regular farm-cotton allotment. Mr. Moseley should apply to his county committee for a group II or new farm-cotton allotment as soon as possible. We expect to complete the determination of new farm-cotton allotments around March 1, after which time he will be notified.

Section 343 of the AAA Act of 1938, as amended by Public Law 272, Eighty-first Congress, provides that if marketing quotas are proclaimed for the 1950 crop (of cotton) farmers eligible to vote in the referendum held with respect to such crop shall be those farmers who were engaged in the production of cotton in the calendar year of 1948. This requirement of law, of course, resulted in Mr. Moseley's being ineligible to vote in the referendum as he did not produce cotton in 1948, and his local referendum committee was correct in refusing to permit him to cast a ballot.

Very truly yours,

Hon. LINDLEY BECKWORTH,
House of Representatives.

DEAR MR. BECKWORTH: This is in reply to the following letters which you recently forwarded to the Department for information concerning 1950 cotton-acreage allotments:

Zen R. May, route 2, Joaquin, Tex., December 17, 1949.

W. M. Taylor, route 2, box 181, Gladewater, Tex., December 14, 1949.

W. H. Boynton, Mount Sylvan, Tex., December 21, 1949.

R. T. Wilkinson, Mount Vernon, Tex., December 14, 1949.

Fred Hamilton, route 3, Henderson, Tex., December 28, 1949.

J. O. McCreight, Yantis, Tex., December 30, 1949.

J. D. Maloney, route 4, Henderson, Tex., December 14, 1949.

Walter Young, route 1, box 52, Tatum, Tex., December 14, 1949.

The legislation under which the 1950 national cotton acreage allotment was apportioned to States, counties, and farms is specific as to the manner in which the apportionments shall be made. The regulations and instructions, with respect to establishing county and farm acreage allotments for 1950, which have been issued to the State and county Production and Marketing Administration committees, who are directly in charge of establishing farm cotton acreage allotments in their respective States and counties, conform to the provisions of the applicable laws.

Enclosed is a statement, together with sufficient copies for each of the above-mentioned persons, which sets forth, in general, the procedure for establishing farm acreage allotments for the 1950 crop of cotton under the existing legislation and the regulations issued by the Secretary in connection therewith. If, after they have studied the statement, they have further questions as to how the cotton acreage allotment for their farm was established, we suggest that they discuss the matter with their respective local county PMA committee.

Sincerely yours,

K. T. HUTCHINSON,
Assistant Secretary.

Hon. LINDLEY BECKWORTH,
House of Representatives.

DEAR MR. BECKWORTH: This is in reply to your letters of November 14 and 17, 1949, in which you inquired as to whether the fact that proportionately more people left farms which had been producing peanuts and cotton in certain counties than from other counties to go into military service or into defense work, was considered in the adjustment of peanut- and cotton-acreage allotments and the allocation of reserves for such allotment crops.

In your letter of November 14, referred to above, you quoted a paragraph from your letter of October 14, 1949, as follows:

"During the war quite frequently a boy went into the Army when the farm he was working did not have enough food units to keep him on the farm. The shortage of food units on a given farm occasionally meant the boy would leave the farm or the man with a family would leave the farm to go into the Army or perhaps to a defense plant. To what extent was consideration given to these facts in the adjustment of cotton quotas?"

The letter which we received from you dated October 14, 1949, stated:

"During the war quite frequently a boy went into the Army when the farm he was working did not have enough food units to keep him on the farm. The shortage of food units on a given farm occasionally meant the boy would leave the farm or the man with a family would leave the farm to go into the Army or perhaps to a defense plant. To what extent was consideration given to these facts in the adjustment of quotas?"

Your notation at the bottom of such letter reads:

"I'd like an explanation of the point system used."

You will note that the letter from you dated October 14, 1949, made no mention of cotton or peanut quotas, and since it appeared to have reference to selective-service matters the letter was, therefore, referred to the Director, Selective Service System, for reply. We notified you of such referral in our letter dated October 26, 1949.

In regard to whether consideration can be given to the factor mentioned in your letters of November 14 and 17, 1949, and restated in the first paragraph of this letter, we wish to point out that Public Law 272, Eighty-first Congress, provided a procedure for apportioning the national cotton allotment to States which did not deal with this matter in a direct way; however, section 344 (e) thereof does provide that the State may reserve not to exceed 10 percent (15 percent in Oklahoma) of its State acreage allotment which shall be used to make adjustments in county allotments for trends in acreage, for counties adversely affected by abnormal conditions affecting plantings, or for small or new farms. Following through on that part of the legislation regarding abnormal conditions affecting plantings, the following paragraph is quoted from the cotton procedure issued to State committees:

"Abnormal conditions affecting plantings: In considering adjustments in county allotments for this factor, the State committee should take into account (a) abnormal weather conditions, such as floods and droughts at planting time which affected plantings during one or more years of the base period (this applies only where plantings were affected); (b) conditions in counties in which a number of farms are being returned to cotton production or are increasing the acreage in cotton after having been out of production or having been on a reduced level of cotton acreage because such farms were used in connection with air bases, defense plants, and other wartime activities; (c) abnormal reduction in cotton acreage because of an unusual movement from farms in the area or county to war industries or into the armed forces as compared with such movements in other areas; and (d) any other abnormal conditions which adversely affected plantings in the area."

The Texas State PMA Committee reserved approximately 128,000 acres of the State cotton-acreage allotment, of which about one-sixth was apportioned to counties of your congressional district thus raising the county cotton-acreage allotment approximately 18 percent for adjustments for abnormal conditions adversely affecting plantings in that area.

Under section 344 (f) (3) of Public Law 272, Eighty-first Congress, county committees may reserve not to exceed 15 percent of the county cotton allotment, a part of which may be used for adjustments for abnormal conditions of production on farms. The extent to which county Production and Marketing Administration committees may have given consideration to such factor is one which we have no way of appraising at this level.

With respect to peanuts, you will recall that during and immediately following the war there was an acute shortage of fats and oils. During this period farmers, at the request of the Government, greatly expanded their peanut acreages to meet our needs for edible oils. As a result, instead of a reduction in peanut production because of the diversion of farm labor to the armed services and to war plants, there was an expansion in all of the peanut-producing areas. As to individual farms, notwithstanding the fact that peanuts were classified as a war crop, the regulations issued for the establishment of acreage allotments followed the provisions of Public Law 12 and provided that as to a farm for which a 1942 allotment had been established and on which the peanut acreage during 1945, 1946, or 1947 was unusually low or on which during these years no peanuts were grown because the owner or operator was in the armed services, a normal acreage for the farm should be determined for the year involved and used as one of the factors in establishing the 1948 and 1949 allotments. The normal acreage was required to be determined on a consideration of the acreage of peanuts customarily grown on the farm, the tillable acreage on the farm available for the production of peanuts, and the acreage of peanuts produced on farms similar with respect to peanut production.

Sincerely yours,

A. J. LOVELAND,
Under Secretary.

Hon. LINDLEY BECKWORTH,
House of Representatives.

DEAR MR. BECKWORTH: Reference is made to your letter of January 5, 1950, requesting a draft and explanation of a bill which would amend the Agricultural Adjustment Act of 1938, as amended, to provide for each cotton farm an acreage allotment of not less than 50 percent of the sum of the acreage planted in cotton in 1937 and the acreage diverted from cotton production in 1937 under the agricultural conservation program, but such allotment not to exceed 40 percent of the cropland for the farm.

The attached draft of a bill contains substantially the same language as that which appeared in section 344 (h) of the Agricultural Adjustment Act of 1938, as amended, prior to the revision of that section by Public Law 272, Eighty-first Congress. The so-called 50–40 provision, as it was applied in establishing cotton-acreage allotments for the 1942 crop of cotton, added approximately 1,100,000 acres to the acreage which was allotted under other provisions of the act. The total acreage allotted for the 1942 crop of cotton was in excess of 27,000,000 acres. We are unable to furnish an estimate at this time of the additional acreage which would be added by the attached bill if it were enacted into law.

In connection with the attached draft, it is to be noted that a majority of the cotton farms in the Nation are at present made up of tracts of land which are different from the lands in the farm when the 50–40 provision was last applicable. Administration of the drafted provision would, therefore, be an extremely complex and time-consuming job for the county Production and Marketing Administration committees. Further, it is quite likely that in some of the counties the necessary records are not available.

The attached draft has been prepared to be effective first with respect to the 1950 crop of cotton. This has been done on the assumption that you would desire it on that basis.

Sincerely yours,

CHARLES F. BRANNAN,
Secretary.

A bill to amend the cotton marketing quota provisions of the Agricultural Adjustment Act of 1938, as amended

Be it enacted, etc., That section 344 of the Agricultural Adjustment Act of 1938, as amended, is amended by adding the following new subsection:

"(m) Notwithstanding any other provisions of this section, the cotton-acreage allotment for 1950 and each subsequent year for any farm receiving an allotment under subsection (f) (1) shall be increased by such amount as may be necessary to provide an allotment for the farm of not less than 50 percent of the sum of the acreage planted to cotton in 1937 and the acreage diverted from cotton production in 1937 under the agricultural conservation program, as determined for each farm in accordance with regulations prescribed by the Secretary: Provided, That this subsection shall not operate to raise the allotment for any farm above 40 percent of the acreage on such farm which is tilled annually or in regular rotation, as determined under regulations prescribed by the Secretary. The additional acreage required under this subsection shall be in addition to the national acreage allotment and the production from such acreage shall be in addition to the national marketing quota."

DEAR MR. BECKWORTH: This acknowledges receipt of your original letter dated December 15, 1949, and mailed December 16, 1949, and a carbon copy of the same letter forwarded to us under date of December 19, 1949.

It is recognized that, through the application of the provisions contained in the Agricultural Adjustment Act of 1938, as amended, including amendments made by Public Laws 272 and 439, Eighty-first Congress, inequities and hardship cases have arisen in establishing farm cotton-acreage allotments for 1950. We feel that some practical means of alleviating these conditions should be provided soon, at least before the cotton-planting season is advanced.

Department representatives have recently appeared before the House Committee on Agriculture with respect to a number of proposals regarding proposed changes in the existing legislation, particularly the one originally introduced by Hon. HAROLD D. COOLEY as House Joint Resolution 384, which is somewhat similar to that mentioned in your letter.

Sincerely yours,

Hon. LINDLEY BECKWORTH,

Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. BECKWORTH: This will reply to your letter of January 9, with which you enclosed a copy of a letter from Mr. S. V. Blasingame, Box 103, Wills Point, Tex. Mr. Blasingame commented at length regarding 1950 cotton allotments in Van Zandt County and referred to the larger cotton allotments determined for Kaufman County farms.

No doubt amendatory legislation now being considered by the Congress will increase cotton allotments for farms in Van Zandt County. However, under existing cotton legislation, county cotton allotments are required to be computed and adjusted under a rather strict formula. As a result it is not possible for county allotments to be determined in a manner that each will have approximately the same cropland percentage factor unless each county had devoted approximately the same percentage of its cropland to cotton during the years 1947 and 1948.

There is a possibility that Van Zandt County should be divided into two administrative areas for the purpose of establishing farm cotton allotments. We have not investigated the possibility, since all of our time was taken in establishing administrative areas in 12 other Texas counties last October prior to the determination of 1950 farm cotton allotments. We intend to conduct an administrative area investigation in about 15 other Texas counties this summer; and if it is revealed that this device for making farm cotton allotments in such counties is needed, it will be used for the 1951 program.

It is my opinion that for diversified counties farm cotton allotments should be determined primarily on the basis of the average cotton history during the 3 years immediately preceding the year for which the farm cotton allotment is being made. In this manner farm allotments will generally be in direct proportion to the amount of cotton acreage that each farm has contributed to the county history. This method of making allotments is now being used successfully in the peanut, wheat, and potato programs. Also, it would mean that administrative area determinations as proposed by Mr. Blasingame would not be necessary.

B. F. VANCE,
Chairman, State Committee.

DEAR MR. BECKWORTH: This will reply to your letter of January 6 with which you enclosed a copy of a letter from Mr. R. G. Maclin, route 2, box 82, Mineola, Tex. Mr. Maclin requested your assistance in securing a larger cotton allotment for his farm.

There is no indication in the letter that county and community committeemen have not established the 15-acre allotment in accordance with regulations and instructions issued from this office. However, if Mr. Maclin is dissatisfied with the allotment, he should file an application for review with the local PMA secretary at Quitman, Tex. A duly constituted review committee will review the determination of his cotton allotment to see that it is fair and equitable and that it was determined properly.

There is a possibility that amendatory legislation now being considered by the Congress will increase his cotton allotment but I can make no commitment since I do not know the provisions of the legislation that may be passed.

I regret that under the circumstances there is nothing that we can do here to increase the farm cotton allotment.

DEAR MR. BECKWORTH: This will reply to your letter of December 31 in which you quoted pertinent portions of a letter from the Upshur County PMA Committee.

I regret that we have been unable to reply to this and many other letters received from you during the last 2 weeks. We have been very busy with several allotment programs, both in national conferences and in conferences with county committees and, as a result, have not had the time nor the personnel required to reply promptly and fully to your letters.

We have no way of knowing in this office whether Upshur County needs an additional 2,000 acres or 10,000 acres of 1950 cotton allotment. In all probability the proposed amendatory legislation now being considered by the Congress would result in more than 2,000 acres of cotton allotment being available for apportionment to farms on which owners and operators have complained to the county committee.

Very truly yours,

B. F. VANCE,

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE,

Hon. LINDLEY BECKWORTH,
House of Representatives.

DEAR MR. BECKWORTH: This will acknowledge your communications of January 13 and 14 in regard to the State committee reserve for cotton and information concerning the effect of the proposed 70–50 amendment.

In retaining an acreage from the State allotment to be used by the State committee for the purposes outlined in the 1950 cotton regulations, the Georgia State PMA committee withheld 100,000 acres, or approximately 7.1 percent of the State allotment. The reason for not withholding the full 10 percent was simply that it was determined that 100,000 acres were all that were needed to fulfill the various needs in the State. Twenty-five thousand seven hundred and thirty acres of the State committee reserve were used for trend adjustments; 47,251 acres were set aside from the State reserve for new farms for 1950. This acreage from new farms on a percentage basis appears large, particularly for a tobacco and peanut State; however, the State survey in regard to the possible number of new farms indicated that the reserve actually withheld was needed to effect new allotments of any consequence for 1950. It should be realized that the acreage set aside for new farms is done so at the expense of the old grower, but on the other hand, if an insufficient amount is available for this purpose, it results in such small allotments to the individual farms that in the end, the acreage is more or less wasted. The State committee attempted to reach a point that would not affect the individual old cotton grower and still be in a position to grant new farm allotments which would warrant the production of cotton on new farms.

Twenty-seven thousand and nineteen acres were reserved to be allocated for farms entitled to the minimum allotments or for small-farm increases. This acreage was in addition to the 22,381 acres directed to be set aside for this purpose by the Cotton Branch of the Department of Agriculture. We might add that in the State the amount of the small-farm increases used was approximately 6,000 acres in addition to the 2 acreages above, as estimated by the Washington office and this office.

The information by counties as requested in your communication of January 14 is not available. It was furnished the Cotton Branch earlier in the month. The State totals, however, were for the 70–50 provision, 43,790 acres, not including war-crop credits in the 70-percent portion. The estimated acreage that would be released for reapportionment for the State was 38,230 acres.

Very truly yours,

T. R. BREEDLOVE,
Chairman, State PMA Committee.

Hon. LINDLEY BECKWORTH,
House of Representatives.

DEAR MR. BECKWORTH: This is in reply to your two recent letters requesting information on production of cotton, by counties, for an average cotton year in a prewar period.

I believe that the year 1939 is about as good an example of an average cotton year in a prewar period as is available. I am, therefore, sending you a series of tables which include the acreage of cotton in cultivation July 1, the yield per planted acre, and the production of cotton by counties for the year 1939.

Sincerely yours,

K. T. HUTCHINSON,
Assistant Secretary.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has again expired.

Mr. COOLEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. WICKERSHAM].

Mr. WICKERSHAM. Mr. Chairman, I do appreciate the efforts of the committee to correct the inequities existing in the present Cotton Quota Act. However, I do wish that the committee could have adopted further remedies which I suggested to the committee prior to the adoption of the act last summer, and at the time the original bill was passed several months ago.

I appeared before the committee some time ago and recommended further changes.

If you will remember, I originally recommended that no individual farmer should be cut below 70 percent of his 1943 acreage, or below 85 percent of his 1942 planted acreage. However, this amendment was not adopted. I later recommended that a longer base period be employed, and urged that no individual farmer be reduced below 70 percent of the average of the years 1941 to 1948, inclusive, and that he be allowed to plant at least 50 percent of the 1949 acreage.

I also recommended that in each instance farmers be allowed to swap cotton- and wheat-acreage allotments at the county and State levels to the extent that such transfers did not exceed the county and State allotments.

I also recommended that more consideration be given to statements of the farmers as to the acreage planted, and not to rely wholly on BAE-estimated figures.

I have previously stated to your committee that I felt the law should have been based more on a historical base rather than a cropland base. Cotton census records are available every fifth year. It was taken in 1946 for the year 1945. Crop-insurance records are available for the years 1942 to 1949, inclusive.

I should like to give you some actual down-to-earth examples as to how the present program would actually work at the grass-roots level. I have had many years of farming experience myself, and have had frequent meetings with various farm groups. I was a member of the House Agricultural Committee for three terms.

As an example, if a farm had been planted to cotton for the last 50 years, including the years 1946, 1947, 1948, and 1949, if the crops in 1946 were destroyed by hail, in 1947 by grasshoppers, and in 1948 by drought or sandstorms, and there was no cotton standing on July 1 of those years, he would not likely receive any allotment, and under the present act would be disqualified from voting for the cotton referendums. This inequity should be corrected. Farmers residing side by side will have allotments varying so greatly that it will lead to dissatisfaction.

In southwestern Oklahoma we have a 74,000-acre irrigation area, which presents a separate problem. In the bill passed several months ago a provision was included to provide that new irrigation sections, particularly California, New Mexico, and Arizona, could plant 95 percent of their 1948 acreage. A similar provision allowing farmers to plant 50 to 70 percent of their 1949 acreage in my irrigation section would be quite helpful, especially in view of the fact that wheat was planted in 1948 and it proved to be uneconomical to spend the large sums of money for water rent to produce wheat. A provision could be adopted that would not take the acreage away from the dry-land farmers.

In many of the counties in southwestern Oklahoma we practice diversification. The farmers planted in 1-, 2-, or 3-year cycles. In many instances they planted wheat in 1946, 1947, and 1948 on land that is ordinarily used for cotton. Because of the lack of rainfall, grasshoppers, rust, extreme heat, hail, and so forth, and because of seasonal changes, farmers have had to diversify in that area.

Although it might appear on its face, figuratively speaking, that Oklahoma has been well provided for, that is not true. Actually, the individual farmer in many areas is cut unbelievably low. Many farmers who received allotments in the State are not interested in growing cotton. Yet, many other farmers need this cotton acreage. There does not appear to be any inducement for farmers to surrender acreage.

Oklahoma is one of the largest cotton-producing areas. Twenty years ago we produced much more; in fact, we were at one time the largest cotton-producing area in the United States, and had the second largest acreage.

Many farmers have purchased farms with a view of raising cotton in 1949, 1950, 1951. They will have no allotment, and this will work a great hardship on them. By all means, let us adopt a provision that would allow those who planted cotton in 1949 to plant at least 50 percent of the acreage in 1950. Many of these are veterans, and have gone into debt for machinery and equipment

Again, may I call your attention to the fact that some may inquire, "Why did you go out of cotton?" Our area has not gone out of cotton production. We merely diversified between cotton and wheat, and occasionally raise oats, barley, grain sorghums and tame grasses, but we must have cash crops in order to survive.

I wish to compliment the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BECKWORTH] who has worked so diligently to encourage the committee to advance the resolution to adjust some of the inequities. He is conscientious and really understands the problems. Both he and I issued warnings several months ago, which have come to pass. I know the members of the committee are conscientious and have the desire to do that which is best. However, the figures on paper do not always work out at the farm level in reality as they should.

I feel that the provision in the committee amendment limiting acreage under this act to 40 percent of the tillable land should be stricken. I also feel that the frozen acreage that is released should be given to the county and State committees to be reallocated to adjust inequities in addition to any acreage that individual farmers will receive under the committee amendment, which would provide that farmers receive at least 70 percent of the average of the 1946, 1947, and 1948 acreage, or 50 percent of the highest acreage of any one of the three years, whichever is the greater.

Mr. COOLEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WICKERSHAM. I yield to the chairman of the Agriculture Committee, the gentleman from North Carolina.

Mr. COOLEY. The gentleman knows very well that the bill itself authorizes State committees to reserve cotton acreage for the purpose of adjusting inequities. It also authorizes the local committees to reserve at the county level 15 percent, altogether almost 25 percent of the acreage could be reserved by the State and local committees. The gentleman knows that; does he not?

Mr. WICKERSHAM. Yes, Mr. COOLEY.

Mr. COOLEY. If that was not done, it certainly is not any fault of ours.

Mr. WICKERSHAM. I am glad that you brought that up, Mr. Chairman, because Oklahoma is the one State that took advantage of every opportunity your committee afforded it under the act. The State committee set aside the full 15 percent, and the county committee set aside the 10 percent, yet these set-asides were not sufficient to meet the inequities in Oklahoma by any means. Our State and county committees are not to blame.

I realize that we will have a large carry-over; therefore my farmers and I are for the program in order to maintain good prices and benefit by conservation practices. However, it will not be nearly as large as it was some years ago. The carry-over as of July 31, 1950, is expected to be about 8,000,000 bales. Here is a table of the cotton carry-over from 1938 to 1948, inclusive:

Carry-over, beginning of season

Year beginning August—	Bales
1938	11,533,000
1939	13,033,000
1940	10,564,000
1941	12,166,000
1942	10,640,000
1943	10,657,000
1944	10,744,000
1945	11,164,000
1946	7,326,000
1947	2,530,000
1948 [1]	3,082,000

[1] Preliminary.

As a result of ECA and the Marshall plan, many countries are recovering, and will have mills and factories in operation that can use more cotton. The populations of the United States and the world are increasing faster. The average life span has been lengthened several years. Many new uses have been found for cotton, and furthermore, we might have droughts, depressions, and crop failures in the future. We should have a reasonable stock pile of cotton. Consequently I am not as perturbed about a surplus.

Mr. COOLEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield such time as he may desire to the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. PASSMAN].

Mr. PASSMAN. Mr. Chairman, I am supporting House Joint Resolution 398 because I believe it is about the best compromise that can be worked out if the cotton producers are to benefit by its enactment for the 1950 crop year.

The bill under consideration does not go quite as far as my bill, H. R. 6671, in that I felt no farm cotton-acreage allotment established for the 1950 crop in conformity with the law and regulations of the Secretary of Agriculture, should be less than 75 percent of the average acreage planted to cotton or regarded as planted to cotton under Public Law 12, Seventy-ninth Congress, on the farm in 1946, 1947, and 1948, or 55 percent of the highest acreage planted to cotton or regarded as planted to cotton under Public Law 12, Seventy-ninth Congress, inasmuch as the bill under consideration proposes a 70–50 formula.

I have always contended that if our price-support program is to survive, acreage allotment must prevail. However, we should be very careful in passing legislation so as to avoid inequities because, in most instances, such inequities affect the economy of the community.

Having surveyed my own district, I know that many of the small farmers, especially tenant farmers, will be forced out of the cotton-producing business unless they are given some relief. For that matter, many of the larger cotton producers in my district have been so drastically reduced that it will be impossible for them to produce cotton profitably.

If both Houses of the Congress pass House Joint Resolution 398, I hope that the Agriculture Committee, in its wisdom, will see fit to continue its study of this far-reaching program. If it is established that there are gross inequities after the amended act becomes effective, then something should be done to alleviate the condition before another crop year.

Mr. COOLEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. HARE].

Mr. HARE. Mr. Chairman, I wish at this time to express my sincere appreciation to the chairman of this committee, the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. COOLEY], to the vice chairman, the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. PACE], and to each member of the Committee on Agriculture for their untiring efforts and their devoted interest in aiding in the solution of a problem that has arisen since the passage of the marketing quota and acreage allotment law during the last session of this Congress. Many inequities have arisen since the passage of that law which were absolutely unforeseeable on the part of any Member of Congress.

I rise in support of House Joint Resolution 398, a resolution to amend the marketing quota and acreage allotment law. However, I sincerely hope that this resolution may be amended in certain particulars, and which I consider to be perfecting amendments.

At the outset, I wish to state that I am absolutely opposed to any form of acreage allotment on any crop because it is nothing more than a further governmental control and regimentation of agriculture. However, I can appreciate why many Members of this Congress feel the necessity for some form of control over production of cotton if the farmer continues to expect a high-parity support price for his commodity.

Mr. WHITE of California. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARE. I yield.

Mr. WHITE of California. Does not the gentleman mean a fair guaranty? He does not mean a high guaranty but a fair guaranty. Is that not correct?

Mr. HARE. The gentleman is correct. I used the word "high" colloquially speaking. In my opinion 100 percent of parity is only a fair guaranty and we have only a 90 percent of parity support price.

In my opinion, most of the cotton farmers are willing to accept a reasonable reduction in their cotton acreage from the average acreage they actually planted in the years 1946, 1947, and 1948. I use the word "actually" advisedly because I do not mean that they are willing to accept a reduction in acreage from the figure which the Bureau of Agricultural Economics estimated the farmers planted in cotton for the years mentioned above.

The allotment law passed during the first session of the Congress bases the State and county acreage allocations on BAE figures. The State BAE figures are just about as correct as can be had. However, the BAE estimates for each individual county are in many instances far from correct. At the same time, I recognize that many farmers overreported their actual plantings because when the records were compiled recently, the farmers' reportings indicated acreage approximately 25 percent in excess of the acreage actually planted. But, the point I wish to make goes to the essence of what I consider the primary difficulty with the existing law and in my opinion the proposed resolution does not correct the same. That is, the existing law and the proposed resolution base State, county, and individual allotments on BAE estimates. This should not be the case. State, county, and individual allotments should be based on actual acreage planted to cotton or regarded as planted to cotton under Public Law 12, Seventy-ninth Congress, during the years 1946, 1947, and 1948. The actual acreage planted by the individual farmers could easily be determined by the local county PMA committee and if such farmers should be dissatisfied, they should be afforded the right of appeal to the State PMA committee. If such was the law, I feel sure that a more equitable individual distribution of cotton acreage would be had. On Monday, when amendments will be in order, I propose to introduce an amendment to the resolution before us that will insure the procedure mentioned above. I do not think that the resolution follows such procedure, even though some Members think it does.

Mr. ALBERT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARE. I yield.

Mr. ALBERT. That is exactly what that language in the law does now. There is no doubt about that.

Mr. HARE. Does not the resolution provide that the acreage will be allotted in accordance with the BAE figures?

Mr. ALBERT. If the farmer is dissatisfied with his allocation he can go before the appeal board and prove his acreage.

Mr. HARE. That is the same old story. They have been doing that. They did it this year and it has not proved satisfactory in the slightest degree.

Mr. COOLEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARE. I yield.

Mr. COOLEY. Does the gentleman have any other method of arriving at a fair-acreage allotment than the method which was used by the Department? The Department took into consideration the reported acreage by the farmers and took the BAE figures.

Mr. HARE. And they adjusted them, too.

Mr. COOLEY. Yes; they adjusted them. What would the gentleman suggest when the fact is that the acreage reported by the farmers exceeded the national-acreage quota actually planted by almost 30 percent?

Mr. HARE. I would suggest that the county committee investigate each individual farmer and let the county committee determine what his actual planting was rather than have the Department of Agriculture tell the farmer what he planted and what the county planted.

It is impossible to perfect an acreage-allotment law within 1 year and that is especially true in this case because the acreage estimates on which any new allotment law must be based are entirely inaccurate. This is a trial and error proposition and we might as well recognize it as such.

Another inequity in the present law but which, in my opinion, the resolution before us corrects is the one regarding what is commonly known as frozen acreage. That is, there are a number of farmers, dairy farmers and the like, who received an acreage allotment which they did not want at all or which was in excess of that which they desired. Under the existing law there is no provision permitting the release of that acreage in order that it may be redistributed to others who desire it. Consequently, many thousands of acres will not be planted which the Congress intended to be planted. I think the proposed resolution corrects this inequity, and I sincerely hope that those farmers who have such acreage will cooperate with the program in order that their neighbors may receive an acreage allotment to their best interest.

Another inequity in the existing law but which the proposed resolution does not correct is that marketing quotas and acreage allotments affect all cotton the staple of which is 1½ inches or less.

Through November of 1949, approximately 58,000 bales of long-staple cotton were imported into this country. Most of this cotton came from Egypt, India, and Peru. A great portion of it was of a staple length of 1½ inches or more. Yet a great portion of it was of 1 7/32- and 1¼-inch staple length. There are many areas in this country that can produce cotton with a staple length of 1¼ inches, and it is more profitable to do so because the price of such cotton is approximately 50 cents per pound. In view of the fact that we are importing such a large amount of that type of cotton, I think that the existing law should be amended so as to provide marketing quotas and acreage allotments on cotton, the staple of which is 1 7/32 inches or less. I propose to offer an amendment to that effect on Monday.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from South Carolina has expired.

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 1 minute.

Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that the chairman of the committee or some other member on the majority side who is interested in this legislation should take some time to explain the bill. That has not been done. I do not know what reason there can be for holding back on a full explanation of the resolution. May I ask my distinguished chairman the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. COOLEY], if he proposes to explain the resolution of which he is author?

Mr. COOLEY. I am sure the gentleman knows the resolution will be fully explained. The reason I yielded to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BECKWORTH] is that he wrote me a letter weeks and weeks ago and has seen me time and again asking me for time. I wanted to let him know that I was doing the very best I could and I yielded time to him first. The same is true as to the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. WICKERSHAM]. We are now coming to the point where some of the members of the committee will speak, and I am sure the gentleman will hear a full explanation of the resolution from now on.

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. I will let the gentleman proceed to explain the bill. This is an important measure. I think we ought to have a full and complete explanation from those who understand the bill.

Mr. COOLEY. I agree with the gentleman.

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. I think there should be a larger audience present to hear the gentleman.

Mr. Chairman, I therefore make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will count. [After counting.] Ninety-four Members are present, not a quorum.

The Clerk will call the roll.

The Clerk called the roll, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

Accordingly the Committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. SMITH of Virginia, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union, reported that that Committee, having had under consideration House Joint Resolution 398, and finding itself without a quorum, he had directed the roll to be called, when 269 Members responded to their names, a quorum, and he submitted herewith the names of the absentees to be spread upon the Journal.

The Committee resumed its sitting.

Mr. COOLEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. WHITE].

Mr. WHITE of California. Mr. Chairman, the big issue on the bill before us at the present time is the basic philosophy of how individual cotton allotments shall be made to the farms. The law which was passed by this Congress not too long ago was based on the philosophy of total crop land, that is, allotting a farmer the amount of cotton that he should plant based on his total acreage of farm land, tilled land, that is.

I said when the hearings were being conducted on that bill that the allocations should have been made to the farms on the basis of history, the actual plantings of cotton, and I recommended that the years 1947, 1948, and 1949 be used, but that the acreage of 1949 on those farms should not be used to the extent that it exceeded 1948.

I still contend that is a just and equitable way to make farm cotton allotments, because it will bring the least interference with the lives of the cotton farmers of this country. What happened? The committee went on and, over my protest, incidentally, adopted a bill which allocates this cotton acreage on the basis of the total amount of land a man owns, or tills, rather than what he has been planting to cotton. Let us look at the situation of a little 40-acre farmer. By the way I want to point out, too, that in the relief which is provided under the resolution we are now considering, there has been placed a limitation of 40 percent, based on the total amount of land that the farmer owns or tills. I contend that is wrong and I am going to offer an amendment to strike it out at the proper time. That was not in the provisions which were in the resolution when the subcommittee of the Committee on Agriculture convened here in December.

Mr. ALBERT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WHITE of California. I yield.

Mr. ALBERT. It is not based on 40 percent of the amount of land that that farmer owns, but it is based on the tillable land, is it not?

Mr. WHITE of California. For all practical purposes that is the same thing. There is very little difference. Of course you do cut out orchards and vineyards but for all practical purposes when you get down to tillable land it is all the real farming land that the man owns. I am glad the gentleman made that observation, but still it is the same thing when you get right down to cases.

Mr. Chairman, again I want to refer to the man with 40 acres. Even under the relief offered in this resolution, if we do not strike out the 40-percent provision a man with a total of tillable acres—thanks to the gentleman from Oklahoma—with a total of tillable acres amounting to only 40 acres, could not plant more than 16 acres. The big man who has plenty of money can buy a lot of extra land and add it onto his farm and he comes out with his big acreage of cotton. It is not fair, it is not equitable, and it is basically wrong to distribute on that basis licenses to do business, you might say, because after all these farmers, or at least most of them, are in effect small-business men. When you begin distributing licenses to do business on the amount of capital a man has, there is no sense to it. It is basically wrong. It is just as though when the gas and light companies come before the respective State commissions for licenses, if the State commission follows the philosophy of this 40-percent limitation of cropland procedure, the Commission could very well grant them their licenses, based on the amount of capital they have instead of on the amount of services that they have been rendering in the gas and light field.

Mr. COOLEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WHITE of California. I yield.

Mr. COOLEY. Then I am sure the gentleman would also oppose the amendment which has been suggested by the American Farm Bureau Federation which would make the 40-percent provision applicable to adjusted acres, rather than to the actual acres on the farm.

Mr. WHITE of California. I oppose that more bitterly than I do the 40-percent provision which is in this Cooley resolution now before us. I am glad the gentleman mentioned that. Incidentally, if I may say so, too, I think the 40-percent provision we have in this resolution was the result of Farm Bureau pressure which was exerted during and subsequent to the December meeting. I do not sympathize with the Farm Bureau's activities at all in doing what I call sticking their nose into this legislation. The Farm Bureau, I think, had a great deal to do with the writing of the last bill and injecting into that bill their philosophy of cotton allotments based on cropland instead of cotton history which is what caused all this trouble we are now facing.

Now, we have by the Cooley resolution which is now before us, provided this relief, by putting farm cotton allotments on a semihistorical basis, and, as I said before, the Farm Bureau comes along with this 40-percent cropland limitation, in order to revert back to the cropland allotment procedure, which is the thing which caused the trouble in the first place.

Mr. COLMER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WHITE of California. I yield.

Mr. COLMER. When the hearing was held yesterday before the Rules Committee on an application for a rule, I asked the question whether a man could be cut more than 30 percent, as I understood the bill was explained, and I received the reply that he could not be cut beyond 30 percent.

Mr. WHITE of California. That was a mistake. He can be cut up to 60 percent.

Mr. COLMER. I understand from the gentleman's statement that if a man had a farm of 100 acres and he planted only 20 acres in cotton, that he could not be cut more than 30 percent.

Mr. WHITE of California. In that case he could not, but if a man had 40 acres which he was planting all in cotton, he could be cut 60 percent under this Cooley resolution now under consideration.

Mr. COLMER. And if he had 100 acres and he was planting all to cotton, he could be cut as much as 60 percent?

Mr. WHITE of California. That is right. Even if he had only 40 acres, and that is all the land he had, and was planting the whole 40 acres to cotton, he could be cut 60 percent under this bill, reducing his cotton acreage to 16 acres.

Mr. COLMER. I understand the gentleman is going to offer an amendment to cut that out?

Mr. WHITE of California. I am going to offer such an amendment, and I hope the distinguished gentleman will support it.

Mr. COLMER. Unless I get further information, I certainly shall.

Mr. WHITE of California. I am glad to hear that. I want to say that I have had considerable assurances from many Members from cotton areas that they will do likewise.

Now, if I may, I would like to dwell for a moment on the supply and demand situation. Many of my friends from the cities have come to me in alarm and said, "Well, what about the increased production that is going to be brought about by the additional production provided under this resolution which we are now considering?"

There is nothing to be alarmed about in the amount of cotton we have on hand. Even with the adoption of this resolution, and with the increased production that would come from it, it is assumed we will still have only 8,000,000 bales of cotton carried over at the end of the coming season. Now, that is not alarming. That is below the average of the last 10 years. I might say to you that it is normal. After all, if you are going to have a healthy condition in the cotton business, you must have what is known as a normal carry-over because the mills cannot just go out and take any kind of cotton. They must have a certain grade and staple. In order for the mills to get their requirements, we used to say before the last war that it took a 5,000,000-bale carry-over to supply the ordinary demand. That is something that many people do not realize.

Mr. GAVIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WHITE of California. I yield.

Mr. GAVIN. We have more than the normal carry-over on hand now, have we not?

Mr. WHITE of California. Well, it is less than the 10-year average.

Mr. GAVIN. How many bales of cotton do we have on hand now?

Mr. WHITE of California. I cannot quote you the figures right this minute, but under this legislation it will be 8,000,000 bales at the end of the season.

Mr. GAVIN. That is more than the normal carry-over, is it not?

Mr. WHITE of California. No; it is not. It is less than the 10-year average carry-over.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from California has expired.

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself one-half minute.

Mr. Chairman, I suggested that some member of the committee, the chairman or someone selected by him, should explain the bill. The first sentence of section 1 of House Joint Resolution 398 states:

> Notwithstanding the provisions of the Agricultural Adjustment Act of 1928.

Section 3 begins:

> Notwithstanding the provisions of section 363 of the Agricultural Adjustment Act of 1928.

Section 4 states:

> Notwithstanding any provision of law.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Minnesota has expired.

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. I yield myself another half minute.

Section 5 states:

> Notwithstanding any other provisions of law.

I would like to have the chairman of the committee or someone designated by him to explain the bill, because I am sure the membership of the House would like to really hear what these "notwithstandings" mean that are contrary to existing law. I trust that the chairman will go ahead with an explanation of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Minnesota has again expired.

Mr. COOLEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 5 minutes.

Mr. Chairman, after long and careful consideration by able and distinguished members of a subcommittee and later by all of the members of the Committee on Agriculture, the cotton-quota law of 1949 was brought before the House. You will recall it met with little or any opposition. Early in January, realizing that the cotton-quota law had to be rewritten, I appointed a cotton subcommittee and designated the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. PACE] as chairman of that subcommittee. Frankly, I do not believe that any bill which has been before our committee received more careful consideration and over a longer period of time than the cotton-quota law of 1949. We were faced with a rather unusual and uncertain situation. No cotton-quota program had been in effect since 1942 and we were woefully lacking in pertinent information; but notwithstanding that, we set about to provide the necessary control machinery which would enable farmers to bring production somewhat nearer in line with reasonable consumer demands. Laboring under very difficult circumstances, we did the very best we could to write a law which would be fair and equitable.

Many important factors could not be evaluated properly. We had no way of knowing the ultimate effect of the provision which was made for the protection of the little farmer. We had no way of knowing the far-reaching and ultimate effect of the provision which was made for the protection of farmers who had diverted their acreage from cotton to the production of war crops. The change from a historic base to the cropland approach was likewise responsible for many of the difficulties encountered. Actually, I do not believe that any Member of Congress did know or could possibly have known the final result which would be accomplished. Neither do I believe that anyone in the Department of Agriculture knew or could have known the full and final effect of all of these uncertain factors. Believing, however, that fair and equitable results would be achieved, we reported the bill and urged its approval. In the war-crop provision we were only keeping faith with cotton farmers who had voluntarily diverted their acreage from the production of cotton to the production of a more essential commodity. The bill was highly technical and contained many provisions and gadgets which were provided in an effort to take care of particular situations and trends. Special consideration was accorded the State of California and another provision was inserted to protect the farmers of Oklahoma. When the bill came before the House, you will recall that after a very brief explanation, I yielded almost all of the time to the distinguished and able chairman of the subcommittee, the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. PACE]. I am sure that all of you will agree that the bill was well and fully explained and that the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. PACE] gave the explanation in superb fashion. Certainly, none of us intended for the law to result in hardships or inequities; but all of us thought and believed that the burdens of the law would fall evenly upon those who were expected to contribute to the reduction program.

It was not until the law was actually put into operation that we discovered that the program would be unfair and that it would actually result in hardships. When the program was applied and the little-grower provision and the other provisions of the law had been put into operation, we realized the full force and effect of the action which had been taken. The matter was first called to my attention by the distinguished gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CAMP], who had received a telephone call from a friend of his who had advised him concerning the operations of the mechanics of the law when actually applied in the field. Upon receiving this information from the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CAMP], I called officials of the Department of Agriculture to my office for a conference. I conferred with an official of the Legal Branch, the Bureau of Agricultural Economics, the Cotton Section, and others. Much to my surprise and to the surprise of other members of the committee, the information which had been passed on to us by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CAMP] was unfortunately substantially correct. Our committee then conferred further and finally decided to try to amend the Agriculture Act of 1949 which was then pending in the Senate so as to increase county reserves from 10 percent to 15 percent. That amendment was offered in the Senate, retained in conference, and became a part of that law. But even this additional provision did not prove sufficient to take care of the situation, and we still find it necessary to make further provisions.

In the quota law of 1949 we provided an acreage reserve of 10 percent of the State allotment and with the amendment which I have just mentioned a reserve of 15 percent of the county allotment, which together amounted to almost one-fourth of the allotted acreage. This reserve acreage should have been used in adjusting allotments and in eliminating inequities, but unfortunately some of the State committees and some of the county committees reserved only a very small part of the acreage which we intended should actually be used in bringing about a fair and equitable distribution of the acreage among farmers. Some States reserved as little as 3 percent, and some county committees made no reservation at all. As a result, while most of the farmers are satisfied with their allotments, a large number of farmers are not only dissatisfied but are distressed over the fact that they might be forced to reduce their acreage as much as 75 or 85 percent—a reduction which was certainly not even remotely contemplated.

The CHAIRMAN. The time for the gentleman from North Carolina has expired.

Mr. COOLEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself six additional minutes.

Mr. EVINS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COOLEY. I yield to the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. EVINS. Mr. Chairman, I would like to commend the distinguished chairman of the committee, the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. COOLEY] and the members of the Committee on Agriculture of the House for the painstaking care with which they have handled this particular subject. As a result of the bill which was passed last year there were certain inequities. The committee has attempted to alleviate these inequities. I shall support House Resolution 398 because I think it will alleviate the present situation. I urge its immediate adoption because of the cotton planting which is going to take effect within the next 60 days. I think we should work with dispatch for the early enactment of this legislation.

Mr. YATES. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COOLEY. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. YATES. Several gentlemen have referred to inequities. Will the gentleman tell the House what those inequities are?

Mr. COOLEY. I will try.

Mr. WHITE of California. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COOLEY. I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. WHITE of California. Would it not be advisable when the gentleman refers to inequities to be rectified by this resolution to say that he is referring to inequities as between the farmers and not as between counties and States?

Mr. COOLEY. Oh, yes. There is no inequity at the State level or the county level. All inequities come about because within a county after consideration had been given to the little grower and to the war-crop provision, and they were faced with having to make a reduction, there was no acreage there to give to these people, to the farmers who should have been entitled to an acreage allotment.

Mr. CARROLL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COOLEY. I yield to the gentleman from Colorado.

Mr. CARROLL. What percentage would the 5-acre farmer and the 15-acre farmer comprise of the whole of the cotton farmers?

Mr. COOLEY. I cannot give the gentleman accurate information in that regard. That is one thing that was uncertain at the time we passed this legislation. When a large group of farmers who planted under 5 acres are not required to make any contribution at all and another group only a slight contribution, a lot of acreage would be involved.

Mr. LANHAM. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COOLEY. I yield to the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. LANHAM. The gentleman has spoken of protecting the small farmer. I think he means by that the small landowner. Is it not true that the small tenant farmer has been forced to leave the farm and go to the city because of the provisions of this bill we passed last year?

Mr. COOLEY. I was going to say that the larger farmer or the person who had traditionally been planting a larger percentage of his crop in cotton has been forced to take a larger reduction. The larger farmer in North Carolina or Georgia, after all, is just so many tenant farmers. It has had a very devastating effect in some sections where land is cultivated by tenants.

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COOLEY. I yield to the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. As I understand the gentleman, under the act of 1949 they took care of the small farmers, the 5-acre and the 15-acre farmer, and they used up most of the cotton allocation or acreage in making that distribution. The purpose of this bill, as I understand the gentleman, is to take care of the larger farmers who have tenants so that they can get more cotton land on which to plant cotton?

Mr. COOLEY. The gentleman knows that was not our intention. We intended in good faith to see that this reserve be used to adjust inequities; but the lack of uniformity resulted because we had given wide discretion to the local committees, believing that the local committees could be well trusted to administer the law. Unfortunately a lot of the members of the committees had never had any experience with control programs and instead of making the necessary reservations and making the necessary adjustments, they disposed of the acreage by passing it out uniformly. It does have the effect the gentleman mentioned. It is going to increase the acreage, the total over-all acreage, a minimum of 1,400,000 acres, but I feel that is well justified in the name of justice and fair play because none of us intended that this law should work a hardship on any tenant or any citizen. We thought it was going to fall evenly and uniformly on all farmers, tenants included.

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. The gentleman knows that it was the intent of the committee writing the act of 1949, with an allotment of 21,000,000 acres, that it would take care of all of these situations that the gentleman has mentioned. Now, why has not the Department down here given orders to the county and the State committees to make this distribution?

Mr. COOLEY. I know exactly what the gentleman has in mind. I think the gentleman knows that we intentionally gave the discretion to the local committees in the States and in the counties. Now, I am not going to complain because the administration did not direct those committees in the exercise of that discretion, and had Mr. Woolley or Mr. Trigg or Mr. Brannan ordered the committees to act uniformly in all circumstances and situations, the gentleman and I would be the first to complain. But I do not think we could complain about the administration here in Washington. The trouble came about back home, and I am not questioning the good faith of the local committees, because I think they did what they thought was right under the circumstances.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COOLEY. I yield to the gentleman from Arkansas.

Mr. HARRIS. As the gentleman from California [Mr. WHITE] indicated a moment ago, the difficulty occurred when we got down to the individual farmer after the allocation had been made to the counties. There we saw how it actually applied to the individual farmer, and we saw these inequities develop. The question arose about the BAE figures and adjusted figures. Will the gentleman, or someone on the committee, explain just how this resolution will work, because we have heard so much about the Secretary of Agriculture not doing this or that? I think the record should be made clear just what this resolution will do and how it will work on an individual-farm basis.

Mr. COOLEY. I compliment the gentleman from Arkansas for meeting here with us last fall and upon his great interest in the cotton farmer and in the success of this measure.

Mr. HARRIS. I, too, want to commend the gentleman and his committee for taking immediate action in this matter to correct the situation.

Mr. COOLEY. While I am anxious for every provision of the pending resolution to be explained fully and while I would be very glad to explain each and every section and the effect of it, I prefer not to yield myself any more time but rather to yield to other members of the committee, all of whom are thoroughly familiar with all of the facts and circumstances involved and with all of the provisions of this resolution. I am especially anxious for the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. PACE], chairman of the subcommittee, to have ample time to discuss this very important matter. I conclude by saying that cotton-planting time is now at hand. None of us should be willing to tolerate the very deplorable situation which is now confronting many of the cotton farmers of the Nation and all of us should be anxious to correct and to alleviate the inequities and hardships which will result in the event this resolution is not enacted.

Before the referendum was held on December 15, I conferred with the members of my committee and with officials of the Department and we explored every possible avenue in the hope that relief might be afforded which would obviate the necessity of legislation but after conferring for many long hours we all concluded that an amendment to the law was necessary. I therefore announced that I would introduce a resolution, substantially in the form of the resolution now before the House, and I further stated that I would do all I could to secure its passage. Notwithstanding the lack of uniformity in allotments and notwithstanding the hardships which might be involved, the cotton farmers of the Nation, having faith in the Members of their Congress, voted favorably in the referendum. I hope, therefore, that this resolution may be passed in its present form and I urge every Member of this House to vote for it.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from North Carolina has again expired.

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. PICKETT].

Mr. PICKETT. Mr. Chairman, I think there is a lack of understanding about what is referred to as the inequities in this program. I want to use one illustration that can be applied, I think, in every county in east Texas, and probably the entire State. Likely similar illustrations can be found in any cotton-growing county in the United States.

There is one man who has been planting cotton in the river bottom on the Trinity River in my home county for 35 or 40 years. He has been planting between 400 and 600 acres of cotton per year. Under the allocation to that farm under present law he is going to be allowed to plant about 68 acres for the year 1950.

Now, what does that mean? It means that the 8 to 12 families who have been living on that farm helping to grow 400 to 600 acres of cotton per year; who have profited when the price was good and suffered when the price was bad; who have stayed with the landlord who has carried them through good times and bad; it means that a majority of those families are going to have to get off of the cotton farm and into another business, unless that cotton farm can be allocated some additional acreage for 1950. Now, that is one illustration.

Another illustration is that there are numbers of small, independent farmers who live in my section of the State—and I think it is true throughout the entire Cotton Belt—who grow anywhere from 10 to 25 or 35 acres of cotton on their own farm. It may be good land or poor land; the yield may be high or it may be low; but, that is their business, that is their stable source of income. Under the allocation of cotton acreage given them under present law, those farms are cut down to the point where the man who previously grew 10 acres of cotton now will be able to plant only 4 or 5. The 25- or 30-acre man is reduced down to where he may be allocated 10 or 12 acres. You cannot make a living in the cotton business in the country where I come from on any such a cut as that. That is an illustration of the inequities we are talking about in this program.

My interest in this matter, as well as the interest of every other man who wants to do equity, is to provide in this bill here a floor below which we do not reduce that man who has to make his living growing cotton, because he does not have time between now and planting time to get into any other kind of agricultural production that he can make a living from in 1950.

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PICKETT. I yield to the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. Does the gentleman feel that the resolution before us does not take care of the situation he has mentioned?

Mr. PICKETT. I do not believe it is going to do everything that is needed, but I would rather have a little bit of something than a whole lot of nothing. So I am going to support this proposal.

I want to ask a question of somebody who helped write this bill. You have restrictions in here that provide that no farm shall be allocated less than 70 percent of the land actually planted to cotton for the three base years or not less than 50 percent of the highest planted in any one of those 3 years. Is that the correct statement, in principle, of what you are writing?

Mr. COOLEY. That is, and war crops will be taken into consideration in connection with both provisions, the 70-percent and also the 50-percent provision.

Mr. PICKETT. One thing that has tangled this situation up so badly is that we had to resort to BAE figures. Is it the intent and purpose of this provision we are considering here now to take this 70 percent and the 50 percent, including war-crop figures, and apply it to the land, or are we still going to have to resort to BAE figures?

Mr. COOLEY. We provide for the right of an appeal by any farmer who is dissatisfied. To use an illustration, suppose a man has been given his allotment based on a history of 60 acres, and he ends up with say 35. They readjust that by giving him 70 percent of the 60 acres, or 42.

Mr. PICKETT. I understand what the chairman of the committee is driving at, and I can answer it.

Mr. COOLEY. Then when he goes before the review committee, he can actually offer the proof to change the original figures upon which the original allotment was made.

Mr. PICKETT. I understand that. Can the chairman tell me whether we are going to have to use BAE figures to appeal from? If it does mean that, that is not going to help the situation much. The reason is BAE figures may be reasonably accurate on the national and State level, but they do not apply to the amount of acreage as actually planted on the farm.

Mr. COOLEY. You appeal from the BAE figures.

Mr. PICKETT. That is right.

Mr. COOLEY. Then you go to the appeal committee and prove that the BAE figures are wrong.

Mr. PICKETT. There is another question I would like to ask. When you get over here to the point where you are going to permit voluntary reallocations, is the man who is going to voluntarily permit the acreage he does not want to plant in 1950 to be reallocated by the county committee to some farmer in that county who does want to plant the acreage going to lose his credit in the 1951 allocations?

Mr. COOLEY. The farmer himself loses the credit.

Mr. PICKETT. That is a different provision than that you had written in your tentative draft on the day this group met before your committee back earlier in January.

Mr. COOLEY. The provision is now different from what it was in the original resolution. Under the provision now, the farmer who voluntarily surrenders the acreage gives it up; but if it is reallocated on a certificate to some fellow in good faith who promises to plant it, then that acreage remains in the county, if in future years the 1950 acreage is used in the program.

Mr. PICKETT. Yes; but does the farmer who permits his acreage to be reallocated in 1950 lose all his right to any acreage at all in 1951?

Mr. COOLEY. No.

Mr. PICKETT. All right. Then it is the intention that if he voluntarily reallocates his acreage in 1950 he still gets his percentage of the factor in 1951?

Mr. COOLEY. No, no; by surrendering it he contributes to the county allotment in the subsequent year and he participates in the larger county allotment just as the others do.

Mr. PICKETT. Will he be considered a new farmer in 1951?

Mr. COOLEY. No; he would not be considered a new farmer.

Mr. PICKETT. He would be considered a cotton farmer just the same as though he had planted his 1950 acreage?

Mr. COOLEY. That is right.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. COOLEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. PACE], the distinguished chairman of the subcommittee which wrote the cotton law of 1949.

Mr. PACE. Mr. Chairman, I should first like to comment briefly on the last question propounded by the gentleman from Texas. It should be remembered that in order to maintain your history as a cotton producer you are required to plant cotton in only 1 of 3 years. The planting on the farm during the 1 or the 2 or the 3 years is important for two reasons only. One is when you plant it on your farm you naturally give the county credit for it and bring that into the county allotment. Secondly, you cannot be allotted more than what you have been planting in the past with some specific exceptions. Consequently under section 3 of the bill, I might say to the gentleman from Texas, the provision is that if an allocation has been made to a farmer who does not intend to plant cotton, either in part or in whole, he may surrender that acreage back to his local county committee for reallocation to other farms within the county. It may then be allocated to other cotton farms in that county on the application of a producer that he has not received an adequate allotment and that he intends to plant the additional acreage if it is allotted to them. That means that such of the surrendered acreage as is allotted to other growers and is planted within the county, the county will get credit for it in future years and thus preserve that acreage for the county.

Mr. PICKETT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman from Georgia yield for a question?

Mr. PACE. I yield very briefly to the gentleman.

Mr. PICKETT. Let us assume that this man who, in 1950, permits his acreage to go to the county committee and suppose he is allocated 10 acres, where does he stand in 1951 with reference to those 10 acres?

Mr. PACE. He will stand, I might say, almost where he was before. There is but one farmer who cannot afford to surrender his 1950 cotton allotment and that is the farmer who did not plant cotton in either 1947 or 1948 because in that case 1950 is his third year and he must plant that allotment or else be classed as a new producer in 1951. But if he has planted cotton in 1948 or 1947 and is given a 10-acre allotment, he can surrender every acre of it and if some other farmer plants it he and his county will be in identically the same position in 1951 as he is in today.

Mr. Chairman, may I go back a little, because I think to fully understand this new law you ought to have a very brief statement of what has been the law for the last 10 or 11 years. The original Cotton Quota Act was passed in 1938. I should like to say it has been amended many times. Those of you who have any feeling of complaint about our asking for these amendments so soon after the new law was passed should understand that the Committee on Agriculture will be here often. The act of 1938 was amended many times. This will also be amended. It is no more and can be no more than trial and error when you are dealing with millions of people and when your records are somewhat inadequate than an attempt to write a law which will be as satisfactory to as many people as possible. It is impossible at any one time to write a perfect law. The chances are you will put wheat under quotas next year. If so I dare say that the wheat producers will be here next year, or perhaps later this year, asking for amendments to the wheat laws which have been on the books for years. There is a chance that corn will be put under quotas next year. I dare say that 30 days after corn is put under quotas they will come in here asking for many amendments to the law. Why? Because you are dealing with a changing scene. You are dealing with so many millions of people. Consequently, there cannot be anything but trial and error.

I think on the whole we produced a good bill. We did it with all the information we had. There had been no quotas since 1942. We had no farm records. We had no county records. We had no national records. We did the best we could. Maybe we were wrong. Maybe we were right. You have all complained about the bureaucrats in Washington. You have all talked about regimenting the farmers, and maybe with some merit. When we drew this law, as best we could, we provided that the Secretary of Agriculture should allocate to each State its fair proportion of the national acreage allotment for cotton under a formula set out in the law. Having done that, he was through with it. We then moved all the authority down to the State, down to the county, down to the home people. That is where we placed it. We placed in them the discretion, we placed in them the administration of the law.

Why are we here? We are here because the law was passed late in the session. We are here because it is a new law. The Department itself had difficulty in preparing regulations in time. We are here because they had no records of cotton acreage since 1942. They were not accumulating records. We are here because the farmers themselves, who constitute your PMA committees, at least 50 percent of them, had never administered a program of this character. They were new in office. Many of the administrative officers themselves were new, and had not had any experience with quota programs. They did not do a good job, in some instances, down at the farm level. As I told you, the old law had been amended many times. The old law was full of these gadgets. The old law provided, for instance——

Mr. HOLIFIELD. Mr. Chairman, a point of order. I make the point of order that a quorum is not present.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will count. [After counting.] Ninety-one Members are present; not a quorum.

Accordingly the Committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. SMITH of Virginia, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union, reported that that Committee, having had under consideration House Joint Resolution 398, and finding itself without a quorum, he directed the roll to be called, when 254 Members responded to their names, a quorum, and he submitted herewith the names of the absentees to be spread upon the Journal.

The SPEAKER. The Committee will resume its sitting.

The CHAIRMAN. At the time the Committee was interrupted by the point of order of no quorum, the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. PACE] had 3½ minutes remaining.

The gentleman from Georgia is recognized.

Mr. COOLEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman from Georgia 10 additional minutes.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield, that I may ask the majority leader a question?

Mr. PACE. I yield.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. I would like to ask the majority leader if he has anything to contribute to the program for next week.

Mr. McCORMACK. Monday will be a continuation of the bill now under consideration, under the 5-minute rule, if the general debate has been disposed of today, as it is hoped.

Tuesday, H. R. 3001, the admission of aliens of certain skills.

Wednesday, Calendar Wednesday.

Thursday and Friday, H. R. 616, which provides for the expeditious naturalization of former citizens of the United States; and S. 88, amending section 60 of the Bankruptcy Act.

Any conference reports that may come in, of course, will be brought up.

If there are to be any changes made, I will advise the gentleman from Massachusetts and the House just as soon as I possibly can.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. I thank you.

Mr. COOLEY. Mr. Chairman, before the gentleman resumes discussion of the bill will he yield for a consent request?

Mr. PACE. I yield.

Mr. COOLEY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may have the right to extend their remarks on the bill under consideration immediately following the speech of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. PACE].

Mr. PACE. Mr. Chairman, at the time of the interruption I had mentioned the fact that in the old law were provisions which we commonly referred to as gadgets, which assured each county of not less than 60 percent of its 1937 planted and diverted cotton acreage, each farm not less than 50 percent of the 1937 planted and diverted acreage, and other provisions. These were the provisions which resulted in building up the acreage to an extent that under the old law the Secretary was limited to a minimum national acreage allotment of 27,500,000 acres of cotton. Naturally, no one, when the farmer has been planting less acreage than that, wanted to stay under a law which would require him to allocate 27,500,000. That was one of the principal reasons why it became necessary to rewrite the act. Those gadgets, those provisions, had caused much trouble. The Department of Agriculture, the Secretary, his predecessor, now Senator ANDERSON, and all the members of this committee realized that it was necessary to get rid, if possible, of these numerous gadgets in the old law. We did that, we wiped them out completely. But at the same time we realized that it was impossible to sit in Washington and meet every situation at the farm level. The committee thought that it would be better to provide for State and county reserves so that, when you gave my State of Georgia a million acres of cotton, for example, the State committee could reserve in its hands and distribute to the counties as much as 10 percent of the State allotment to meet the situation where there had been a trend in the production of cotton in one part of the State as distinguished from another, for meeting special allotments to new farms, and for building up the allotments for small farms. That was one provision. The other provision was that when the county received its allotment, say, of 10,000 acres of cotton, that the county committee could reserve 15 percent, which in that instance would be 1,500 acres, to be specially allocated within the county for the purpose of bringing about an equitable distribution of the cotton allotments after the original allotment had been made on a cropland basis, for hardship cases, new and small farms.

We retained in this law the principle of allocating cotton acreage according to a percentage of cropland. We did it for several reasons; the first was that it had been law; since 1938 cotton allotments had always been made on the basis of a percentage of the cropland; secondly, the Department, the committee, and no one else had any records on which to make an allocation purely on the basis of history, that is, exactly how many acres had been planted on each farm. No records were kept during the war, none had been kept from 1942 through 1948. The Congress through the years has worked to advance the cause of soil conservation by the rotation of crops; and, frankly, this committee is committed to the principle that it is not a healthy thing for a man to devote his entire farm or the major portion of it to the continuous cultivation of cotton. That was one of the persuasive reasons for the committee to retain the cropland factor.

What happened? Why are we here? We gave the State committees the authority to retain 10 percent of the State allotment to take care of the conditions I have mentioned. Some of the State committees did. Others in their wisdom did not.

We gave the county committees the right to reserve 15 percent to take care of hardship cases and to bring about some uniformity, taking into account the past production of cotton on the farms. Some of them reserved the 15 percent, some of them reserved 10 percent, some of them reserved 5 percent, and some in their wisdom reserved zero percent.

It is largely in the areas where the reservation by the county and State committees was not up to the full amount authorized by law that these complaints have arisen. You may say, "Well, that is a matter of local administration and they should bear the burden." No; that is not the fault of the cotton grower. It was a new law. There were many new committees. They were farmers charged with a responsibility which was new to them. I am quite sure that for the most part they did an honest job, the best they could, but in many instances they brought about gross inequities.

Mr. Chairman, the complaints became general throughout the cotton area. In November the complaints started. There was unrest, there was discontent. The State of Texas had been brought under what we know as the California gadget when the committee had no intention of bringing that State under the gadget and had been told it would not come under it. There was revolt throughout the State of Texas. There were serious complaints in other areas.

Our distinguished chairman became concerned, I became concerned, as to whether this discontent was sufficient to defeat a referendum. Let us see about that. In my judgment, a defeat of the referendum or failure to approve the quotas on cotton would have had two consequences.

First, it would have wrecked the economy of the South. It would have had the effect of striking the price of cotton from 30 to 15 cents a pound. In my State and in many of the other States of this Nation you cannot today produce a pound of cotton for 15 cents. It would have wrecked the whole economy of the Cotton Belt.

Secondly, the Government owns 3,750,000 bales of cotton in which it has invested approximately $150 or $160 a bale. If the referendum had been defeated, it would have had the effect of striking the price of cotton from 30 to 15 cents a pound and your Government, in effect, would have lost overnight from $75 to $100 per bale on 3,750,000 bales of cotton, beside the additional losses that would have been sustained on the loan cotton they had taken and are taking under the 1949 crop. So, if the referendum had been defeated, our Government alone could have lost as much as $600,000,000 besides wrecking the economy of the cotton-producing States.

Our chairman became concerned and called us to Washington in a special meeting. We came here. We looked into the question. We heard the complaints. Many Members of Congress from the cotton-growing States met us here. As a result of that meeting we issued a public statement in the name of the committee—the chairman did—that so far as the cotton farmers of this Nation were concerned we realized there were inequities that had been brought about and at the convening of the Congress we would immediately ask the Congress to take prompt action to correct those inequities. We stated that our recommendations would be what you will find in section 1 of this resolution; that is, that every producer would receive a cotton-acreage allotment of not less than 70 percent of his average cotton acreage in 1946, 1947, and 1948, and not less than 50 percent of his highest plant in any one of those years.

That responsibility is not yours and I do not intend to put it upon you. The responsibility is that of the committee you have charged with the task of writing this legislation. Personally, I think the action of our committee here in early December before the referendum on December 15 contributed to the vote in the referendum. Frankly, for my part, we are completely obligated now to carry out the statement we issued before the farmers voted, realizing the consequences of a defeat of the referendum. The farmers marched to the polls on the 15th day of December, and approximately 90 percent went down the line, voted for quotas, and many of them with cotton allotments which they knew were not fair or equitable, for the reasons I have stated, and they now turn to the Congress and I, in their behalf, turn to you to fulfill what I consider an obligation which is no more, thank goodness, that being fair and equitable among all the cotton growers of the Nation.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PACE. I yield to the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. COOPER. The gentleman knows that I have worked diligently on this matter for some time, and met with the Committee on Agriculture trying to help meet and solve this problem. I want to commend the gentleman for the splendid effort and the hard work that he has devoted to the subject. I believe the pending resolution will improve the existing situation, although I realize the time is very limited, and I hope the gentleman will have an opportunity to point out the improvements contemplated under this resolution as against the present program.

Mr. PACE. I thank the gentleman. I will undertake to do that now, and I must express my appreciation to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. COOPER] for the help he has given our committee and the tireless efforts he has made to bring about a fair and equitable distribution of the cotton acreage to all cotton farmers.

Mr. CAMP. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PACE. I yield to the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. CAMP. I have followed the gentleman very closely, and I am very glad to hear him say that he feels that it is the desire of Congress, especially his committee, to carry out and give the farmers what they were told they would get before they voted on the act. Now, the gentleman says that this resolution undertakes to give them at least 70 percent of their cotton acreage.

Mr. PACE. Seventy percent of the 3-year average?

Mr. CAMP. Yes. I note in the bill there is this provision:

Provided, That this section shall not operate to increase the cotton-acreage allotment of any farm above 40 percent of the acreage on such farm which is tilled annually.

Mr. PACE. I can explain the views of the committee on that, and realize the gentleman's deep interest in that subject.

Mr. CAMP. Well, I just want to ask this question. Please explain this. Under that section will it not, in many instances, result in a farmer getting from 40 to 50 percent of the cotton he has been planting?

Mr. PACE. Unquestionably it will have that result, if that farmer has devoted a very high percentage of his total cultivated land—not the adjusted acreage, but his total cultivated land in cotton.

Mr. CAMP. That is right.

Mr. PACE. But the committee feels that the county in which that farmer lives—say it is my home county, Sumter County, Ga.—has already received its full quota under the allocation, there is no complaint here about State allotments and very few complaints about county allotments; but my county has already received every acre it is entitled to. Now we propose under this resolution to give it a little more to meet these hardship cases, and we say, when we add this acreage and give this producer a special allotment of more acreage, that we feel no obligation to give him an allotment that will put more than 40 percent of his entire farm in cotton, and, to do so would add hundreds of thousands of more acres to the land planted in cotton. We must stop somewhere.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Georgia has expired.

Mr. COOLEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman five additional minutes.

Mr. PACE. May I say further to my distinguished colleague that that 40-percent provision has been in the law since 1938. It is nothing new in the law. We picked it up out of the old law, and we have continued the same language word for word, that is, the language of the old law.

Mr. HARE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield.

Mr. PACE. I yield to the gentleman from South Carolina.

Mr. HARE. I would like at this time to register a complaint, if none has been registered, insofar as the county acreage is concerned. Now, I would like to inquire of the gentleman, because I have very great respect for his judgment, as I think he is the most well-posted man in this Congress on agricultural matters——

Mr. PACE. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. HARE. Is it his opinion that under the proposed resolution now before us that the allocations of acreage to the individual farmers and to the counties will be made on the actual acreage they plant or on BAE's statistics?

Mr. PACE. I will have to answer rather briefly because of the limitation of time. It is recognized that in many instances the BAE figures are not accurate. The BAE figures were never intended for use under a quota system. It is admitted that all they are is the best the Department can get through the years from the hands of a few people in each county. Now we have provided in this resolution that any farmer who is dissatisfied with the allotment he gets, by reason of his base acreage or for any other reason, may, within 15 days after the approval of this resolution, file an appeal to the review committee, having in the meantime, if he desired, gone to his county committee to try to get relief, and if he cannot get it there, to go to the review committee and submit such proof as he has to show that his base acreage is wrong, and if it is found to be wrong, then it is the duty of the review committee to adjust it and give him an increased allotment.

Mr. HARE. I appreciate the gentleman's observation.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PACE. I yield to the gentleman from Arkansas.

Mr. HARRIS. Is it not a fact that the reason the difficulty has arisen over the question of BAE figures and actual planted acres and adjusted figures is the fact that there are no BAE figures on the individual farm?

Mr. PACE. None whatever.

Mr. HARRIS. It applies to the county and the State, not to any of the individual farms?

Mr. PACE. You have almost the exact acres on a national basis, you have almost correct figures on a State basis, you have rather good figures on a crop-reporting district basis, but when you pass that point, which is some 8 or 10 counties, and get down to the county and the farm level, it is entirely a matter of estimates and of speculation. But that is all they had.

Mr. HARRIS. That is where the county committees had the difficulty in trying to adjust the present law.

Mr. PACE. That is one reason we are here today. That is all the record they had, and they did the best they could.

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PACE. I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. McCORMACK. The gentleman from Georgia had no idea that I was going to ask him to yield to make the observation that I am about to make.

The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. PACE], as we all know, is not only one of the best-liked Members of the House but one of the most valuable Members of the House on all types of legislation coming before this great body of which we are all proud to be Members.

In addition, from the angle of agriculture, he is probably one of the outstanding experts of the country. We all thoroughly respect him as a gentleman and as a legislator, we value him as a friend, and we have deep respect for him for his honest and frank discussion of agricultural matters not only today but throughout the years.

I am very sorry to hear, and I hope the people of his district will prompt him to change his mind, that he has decided not to seek reelection again. In these trying days we need trained and experienced legislators to help meet not only the problems of our country but the grave problems of the world. I am not going to ask the gentleman from Georgia to make any observation because he had no knowledge that I was going to make these remarks, but I do hope, for whatever value my observation may be to the people of his district, that they will realize that he is deeply respected and admired by his colleagues of both parties throughout the entire country. While he comes from a congressional district in Georgia, he enjoys the respect of the Representatives of all the congressional districts of the country, north, east, south, and west. I hope the people of his district, as they have exercised sound judgment and wisdom in the past in electing him to this body, will exercise sound judgment and wisdom in urging, in fact, demanding that he run and be reelected again.

Mr. PACE. Of course, the gentleman knows I am most grateful for his comments.

Mr. EVINS. Mr. Chairman, I want to say that this amendment which we are considering here today is of the utmost importance and urgency to the cotton farmers of my district, the Fifth District of Tennessee. It would be impossible to describe the consternation which prevailed generally in my district—but especially in three counties, Lincoln, Giles, and Franklin Counties—when the cotton-acreage allotments were announced and made known last fall.

The cotton farmers of my district were cut in amounts far greater than the national average—and far greater than cotton-producing sections comparable and adjacent. The financial loss which these producers stand to experience unless some changes are worked out in the law will be so far out of proportion to other producers as to constitute unfairness and discrimination under the law.

I should like to cite an example of the discrimination which has developed under the present statute. The three counties of my district which have been hardest hit by the new acreage allotments are all adjacent to the State line of Alabama. Riding along on the highways it would be impossible to tell from the terrain and general type and quality of the crops when you have crossed the Tennessee line and entered the State of Alabama. This entire region of my district is as much a part of the Cotton Belt as any other section of the South. The region of my district of which I speak and the adjacent region in Alabama are all in the basin of the Elk River and for many years the farmers there have based their entire farm economy on cotton crops.

Yet, under the cotton-acreage allotments, the cotton farmers in this area specifically, and my district generally, have been dealt with most drastically and have been given extremely low allotments while their neighbors across the State line who raise the same crop on the same kind of soil have been given a much higher allotment. The low allotments presently authorized will play havoc with the cotton farmers in my district—but just as important as that, these farmers of the Fifth District are the victims of unequal treatment under this program.

It is only fair and just and right, in order to end these inequities which have developed under this program, that an amendment be made to the Cotton Acreage Allotment Act which not only will increase the acreage allotment for the cotton farmers of the Fifth District of Tennessee—but provide them with equal treatment to comparable and adjacent areas in other States.

I am supporting this amendment here today in the belief that it may provide the relief that is so greatly needed in this connection for our cotton farmers. The bill may not provide all the relief desired but it will certainly help. If we do not do something here today for these cotton farmers we are going to see many cotton producers both large and small hurt financially to a great extent. To allow this situation to prevail is to invite conditions of bad times which is not in the interest of the South or of the Nation as a whole.

I sincerely trust that the House here today will move in the right direction to correct this situation—action cannot be delayed because these farmers have a right to know what to expect far enough in advance of the planting season to give them an opportunity to plan ahead. Action is needed and action without delay is imperative.

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. HILL].

Mr. HILL. Mr. Chairman, I am twice honored to say a few words on this resolution. It is an honor to follow my great friend, the chairman of our subcommittee, the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. PACE] to whom you have given such a hand this afternoon, and second, to speak on a general plan of acreage control wherein the producer enters into programs voluntarily.

To begin with, I want to disqualify myself as an expert on cotton. As a member of this subcommittee, as my subcommittee chairman, the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. PACE] will tell you, I missed very few meetings if it were at all possible to attend. The problems that face us on cotton-acreage control are exactly the same problems and contain all the elements which will face us when we begin to talk about curtailing wheat acreage. They are exactly the same problems that our friends from the Corn Belt will have when they come into the Well of the House and say, "We must have some type of a corn-acreage-control program.

So I am not surprised and I do not think a single Member of the House should be surprised, even if he comes from the city, that the Committee on Agriculture is here today to change or amend this law. To me the surprise is that we are asking so few changes. We are trying to legislate from the top. We are planning rules and regulations which will affect the farmer at the individual end of the production line of food and commodities. How can you expect a legislative body such as we are to set up regulations such as we are now considering without getting into difficulties? So there is not anything unusual about this resolution. We will encounter many more difficulties as we proceed with acreage-control legislation. This House for the next 5 or 10 years, undoubtedly, will be working on the individual problems concerning the various commodities that we produce. We are only beginning. We should support the experts, who have labored long hours over the detailed provisions in this legislation. Let me pay a compliment here to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. PACE]. No man has worked harder. No one has worked longer hours than Mr. PACE on this legislation. When we came to work on wheat-control acreage the cooperation we had from this gentleman was 100 percent. Why? Because he represents agriculture in all its broad amplifications. The House can ill afford to lose the services and the wide experience of such men as Congressman PACE.

Mr. WHITE of California. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HILL. I yield.

Mr. WHITE of California. I heartily concur in what the distinguished majority leader said. While I may be called upon in the future to buck the gentleman from Georgia on certain things in legislation, I want everybody to know I consider him one of the finest gentlemen I have ever known and probably the greatest authority on agriculture that has ever graced the Halls of the Congress.

Mr. HILL. May I say to my friend, the gentleman from California, that he and I disagree considerably, but we come from a territory where we understand what we mean by bucking and getting bucked off. This afternoon as I sat and listened to the arguments of the Congressmen of Texas, I was happy to see them scrapping amongst themselves. It all adds up to progress.

Mr. PICKETT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HILL. I am delighted to yield to my colleague from Texas.

Mr. PICKETT. Let it not be understood that we are scrapping with each other; we are scrapping for each other and for the cotton farmers of America.

Mr. HILL. Might I also add to the statement of my good friend that they are all for this resolution, strange as it may seem, because this is the first step in correcting some of the errors we are bound to make on legislation.

To begin with, we are the only Nation in the world that ever bankrupted its farmers by overproduction. We better learn to live with surpluses. I testified before the Committee on Rules yesterday, and one of the things I said—and I insist it is correct—is that we should not be focusing our attention on the surplus. We should be directing our attention to the disposition of surpluses. That is our job. We can produce the commodities. We know that, but our Department of Agriculture should put its most competent men to work developing programs for the sale and distribution of surpluses. This, gentlemen, they certainly have not done.

Let me give you an illustration on cotton. I am not sure of these figures, but I am sure that at one time we had about 44,000,000 acres of cotton. Today, under this bill, which we passed in 1949, we set cotton acreage up as 21,000,000 acres. That is quite a reduction. That is quite a curtailment. What are you going to do with the little farmer? Put him out of business? That is exactly what you will do if you reduce acreage too drastically. We must take into consideration that a cut from 44,000,000 acres of cotton down to 21,000,000 is a real cut.

Another thing: No more important testimony was ever given before any committee of this House on agriculture than was given by my chairman, the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. COOLEY], yesterday before the Rules Committee.

Listen to his statement. I can quote him almost word for word. He said that if we carried out our acreage reduction, as proposed by the Secretary of Agriculture, we will take out of cultivation in these United States 30,000,000 acres of agricultural land. Does that mean anything to you? It means something to every man, woman, and child in the United States. Thirty million acres in a block is larger than the State of Maine. Yet we stand in the well of this House and legislate on acreage reduction as if it were a casual matter when really it may mean total collapse of our economic system if carried to extremes.

Now, Mr. Chairman, we can get into difficulties. We are still not legislating for agricultural production when we pass bills and pass rules and regulations. I will tell you who legislates for agricultural production permanently, absolutely, and eternally, and that is Mother Nature in person. She still controls the seasons.

I want to include in my remarks a report from one of my papers which just came in, running under an editorial. Do you know what they said? Here it is:

STATE FACING DROUGHT THREAT

Experts said today that Colorado would have drought or near-drought conditions next summer unless we have a wet late winter and spring.

None would actually predict the weather for the coming months, but all were agreed that the dry fall and early winter was bad.

Only one official was optimistic about the moisture and crop conditions.

Paul Swisher, State agriculture commissioner, said "It's beginning to look pretty bad. I've just been on the western slope, where it's pretty dry and we're beginning to get some wheat damage in the eastern part of the State. There's not enough snow cover in the mountains."

Daniel I. J. Thornton, Gunnison County rancher and Republican State senator, said, "There's a danger of a water shortage if the snow continues short. It's not so bad high in the mountains, but it might be bad lower down near Paonia or Hotchkiss."

William White, Pueblo County rancher and businessman, said "It's dry as hell. Look at what happened at Colorado Springs. Moisture is a whole lot shorter than a year ago. Crops are blowing out east of Pueblo."

Larry Miller, Rogen rancher said, "if we get spring moisture, we'll be okay. If we don't it'll be bad."

All agreed that the wettest part of the winter was yet to come—in February and March.

Floyd K. Reed, statistician with the United States Agriculture Department in Denver, was optimistic.

"I don't take the pessimistic view yet," Reed said. "You tend to overlook the fact that we never get much moisture this time of year. One of our reporters in the driest part of the State said the wheat was fine."

The United States Weather Bureau in Denver called last fall "extremely dry."

"November was one of the driest on record," the recorder said.

A comparison of snow figures around the State shows less snow on the watersheds than last year. "It's some below normal," the recorder said.

The mountain sides in Colorado are literally ready to explode and burn up. Eight men recently lost their lives in a brush fire near Colorado Springs, Colo. You would think it was serious if any of these men were your relation.

Mother Nature will determine whether or not we will have surpluses. We ought to be happy that we have more cotton than we can use; that we have more corn than we can use; and more pork than we can use. We should build a program of selling the surpluses. The Department of Agriculture proposes nothing worthwhile in offering giveaway programs of surplus farm commodities. Sales promotion holds the solution.

I issued a release which I will place in my remarks to show that I am afraid of some of these men who have charge of the disposition of surplus commodities through this period when we have been creating surpluses are not qualified for the important position they now hold.

The release is as follows:

The Department of Agriculture announced yesterday a so-called new pricing policy for the sales abroad of food surpluses owned by the Commodity Credit Corporation. It is quite clear that the announcement does not constitute a new policy, but rather continues the do-nothing approach that has been Brannan technique from the beginning. In building up stocks and surpluses, accompanied by mounting storage charges, and waste through spoilage, Secretary Brannan is not only ignoring the specific directions of Congress but is responsible for the waste of hundreds of millions of dollars of taxpayers' money.

During the last session, the Congress directed the Secretary of Agriculture to give particular attention to the establishment of a program for the disposal of accumulated surpluses of food and agricultural commodities owned by the Commodity Credit Corporation. Specific authority was written into law authorizing the distribution of any of the surpluses to State, county, or local welfare agencies, and the Bureau of Indian Affairs with those agencies assuming transportation and handling costs. The Secretary of Agriculture was also authorized to sell any surpluses in export markets at any price he could obtain or could justify.

Yesterday's announcement does not constitute a program and will not result in the movement of any substantial quantities of our surpluses. Inasmuch as the Commodity Credit Corporation has invested over $3,000,000,000 in food and agricultural stocks and is seeking another $2,000,000,000 in borrowing authority to carry out price-support programs already announced, I believe that Secretary Brannan and the officials of the Commodity Credit Corporation should be the subject of a full and far-reaching investigation. I am requesting the chairman of the House Agriculture Committee to immediately set dates for hearings.

Mr. Chairman, I insist this is no answer to the surplus problem.

It is time we put first things first, Mr. Chairman. There are hundreds of millions of starving people in the world today. I, for one, say that you cannot send money to any country that has a notion to go Communist, and in any way contain communism. The very best program that this Nation could use to block and stop the growth of communism is to assist in providing full stomachs. Plenty of food for poor people from our surpluses certainly would create a feeling of appreciation for our American system.

We know we can produce the food.

Two men were in my office this morning, and they were talking about this very bill. Do you know of what these gentlemen complain? They are afraid that the Department of Agriculture will not allot them the permit to produce an acre of cotton or an acre of peanuts.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. HILL] has expired.

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman five additional minutes to conclude the fine speech he is making.

Mr. HILL. Regardless of the fine speech the gentleman says I am making, I am merely trying to set out the facts that we face. Let us go back to what I was talking about. The Department says to these farmers, "You cannot produce peanuts, you cannot produce cotton, you cannot produce any products that you want to produce, because you have no history of previous production." We have made provision for such cases. But the law has not been properly interpreted. I call your attention to the fact that in great areas of the West, we are bringing in land for cultivation, new lands, and no man can tell what the production may be or what useful commodities may be produced on those lands. These are factors we must think about as we legislate. Let no one be surprised if we come in with other amendments, for we are not dealing with a static situation, and the law is not final in its present form.

I am going to read quickly what certain basic prices were as of January 1, 1948, and give the percentage that represents to the price of last November (New York wholesale prices). For instance, oats per bushel were $1.52 in 1948; last November they were selling for 76 cents a bushel, off about 50 percent. Corn went down from $2.95 a bushel in 1948 to $1.17 as of November 5, 1949, off about 60 percent. Wheat dropped from $3.20 to $2.10, off 33⅓ percent. Cotton per pound dropped from 40 cents in 1948 to 30 cents, off 25 percent. Lard was off 74 percent, and cottonseed oil was off 67 percent; yet some Members tell the House that the farmer is swimming in money, that the banks in agricultural sections are full of money and that the farmer has never had such good times as he is now enjoying. Those statements are only partially true. The figures I have read to you cannot be disputed.

Mr. NICHOLSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HILL. I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. NICHOLSON. Are the prices the gentleman quoted prices at the table of the consumer or prices on the farm?

Mr. HILL. I did not mention that, but the prices were New York wholesale prices. I was speaking of wholesale prices in New York.

Let me close by quoting further from economic trend line studies; and this goes back to the beginning of my remarks:

The forces of nature are uncontrolled and uncontrollable. The farmer, like the animals and birds, tamed and untamed, has learned to adapt himself to Nature's fickle face.

Before the Nation is another generation older, we will have received again a lesson we have already been given many times and which we have ignored, namely, that in dealing with agriculture we must reckon first, not with farmers, not with consumers, not with plans for a welfare state, but with that great and all pervading force called nature. Great and strong and pervasive as the influence of the United States Department of Agriculture may be in agriculture, it cannot deal directly with the natural forces that give to and take away from the farmer. Only the men who can walk into the fields and feel the warmth or the wetness of the soil, who can rub heads of wheat between their hands and know its readiness for harvest, who can perform the exacting farm tasks wth consummate skill—only these men can take from nature the abundance that nature is presently being induced to give. It should never be forgotten that our present bounty rests on the agricultural ability of millions of farmers. Unexercised and unencouraged under the cold statistical stipulations of a bloodless bureaucracy, this ability to produce abundantly could in one uninstructed farm generation become only a poignant memory.

Drastic reductions in farm production are long overdue, but the actual cutting back of individual farm crops and products must be done by the farmers themselves. They alone can trim agricultural production as a unit without injuring any part of its efficiency and without destroying its expansibility. Contraction attempted on a piecemeal basis by the Department of Agriculture, based solely on statistical compilations, can only work incalculable harm to what is undoubtedly our greatest national asset.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Colorado has again expired.

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CRAWFORD].

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. Chairman, I have great interest in this resolution because of two facts. First, it does deal with the economy of the great South of this country, and, second, I agree with the gentleman from Colorado that this is a forerunner of what we face in crops which are grown in the central West, in the irrigation and reclamation areas of the far West, as well as some of the other sections of the country.

I have been studying this report and resolution very religiously so as to try to be able to think through some of the situations we will have to deal with as other legislation comes before us under these so-called crop controls which are coming up over the horizon so rapidly in this country.

I should like to ask the chairman of the Committee on Agriculture two or three questions in order to bring us a little better up to date on some of this cotton development. First, what is the greatest number of bales of cotton the Commodity Credit Corporation has ever owned at any one time and the approximate date it was owned by the Corporation and how was that substantially disposed of?

Mr. WHITE of California. In answer to the gentleman's question, 11,000,000 bales in 1939. The way it was disposed of was through the normal channels of trade. I think that can be proved by the fact that previous to our entry into the war the amount of cotton that the Government held August 31, 1941, was only 6,000,000 bales, which was within a million bales of the normal 5,000,000-bale carry-over that prevailed previous to World War I.

Mr. CRAWFORD. The gentleman from California pointed out to us earlier in the afternoon that the normal carry-over was something like 8,000,000 bales. Do I understand him to say that prior to the war the normal carry-over was about 5,000,000 bales?

Mr. WHITE of California. That was the normal carry-over at that time. If I may correct the gentleman, I said that the 8,000,000 bales was not the carry-over but it was less than the 10-year average carry-over in the recent past 10 years.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Taking the average 10-year carry-over from 1939 to 1949, as I understand the gentleman, he says that was approximately 8,000,000 bales?

Mr. WHITE of California. No; the average is more than that. The 8,000,000 bales is what we estimate will be on hand at the time of the coming season if the Cooley resolution is adopted.

Mr. CRAWFORD. What was the carry-over at the end of the last cotton year?

Mr. GATHINGS. The carry-over as of August 1, 1949, was 5,287,000 bales.

Mr. CRAWFORD. 5,000,000-plus?

Mr. GATHINGS. 5,287,000.

Mr. CRAWFORD. What was the production for the crop year of 1949?

Mr. GATHINGS. It is estimated at 16,034,000 bales.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Then, as of December 31, or we will say at the end of the harvesting season, you had in sight approximately 21,000,000 bales of cotton?

Mr. GATHINGS. That is correct, 21,321,000 bales. The estimated domestic consumption would be 8,000,000 bales, estimated export 4,500,000 bales, making a total of 12,500,000 bales to be consumed here and abroad. If you deduct that 12,000,00 from the August 1 carry-over, together with the 1950 crop, 21,321,000, there will be a carry-over on August 1, 1950, of only 8,821,000 bales.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Those are the figures I wanted to get into the RECORD. Here we are dealing with further estimates of consumption and exports.

Mr. WHITE of California. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will yield, may I say for the benefit of the committee in general that all of those figures are outlined on page 14 of the report.

Mr. CRAWFORD. I wanted to get them in the debate. We are dealing here with some very far-reaching estimates. Suppose domestic consumption fails by two or three million bales, or suppose exports fail by two or three million bales?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Michigan has expired.

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 3 additional minutes.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Then everything is very much up in the air. Now, what will cause those estimates to not materialize? What will substantially cause them to not materialize? Well, that gets us into some of the discussions prompted by the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. HILL]. Personally, I have never felt that we had any surplus of agricultural goods in this country. As these tonnages pile up, it simply shows that we have passed the market; that we did not take the market and put this production into the market for consumption at the time the market was flowing, and that gets you into trouble whether you are an individual farmer or engaged in a farming industry; whether cotton, wheat, corn or what not. These breaks in farm prices have been quoted by the gentleman from Colorado; they are staggering. You are running into a drop in national income of about 20 billion dollars under last year, because we have about a three-billion-dollar drop in gross agricultural income as the result of these declines in prices, and you can practically calculate that for each dollar drop in gross farm income you are going to have a five- to seven-billion-dollar drop in national income.

Now, what causes these things to occur? We have built manufacturing wages up in this country on a level where you will either maintain a high wage for the farmer or the farmer will not buy the manufactured goods, and the cotton-estimate figures, such as have been read into the RECORD, will not materialize. Your surpluses will appear because you do not have the market for them. You do not have the market internally because the cost of them gets so high that the people who are actually producing the goods actually cannot afford to buy them, just as England has done in recent years, in which she took herself out of the world market. I do not know of any country on earth where the process of taking itself out of the market, internally and externally, is progressing any faster than here in the United States. If I wanted to destroy a country, I would engineer around to where I could get some forces at work inside of that country which pushed up their cost of manufacture, resulting in an increase in the cost of the selling price, and I would let that destructive influence work, and certainly somebody has done a job of perfection here in the United States, and it is beginning to kick back on us. What would have happened in the last 2 or 3 years if we had not taxed the people of this country something like thirty billion in order to give the goods away in the other parts of the world? There is a great deal involved in this resolution and I hope under the 5-minute rule that we can discuss it much further than at the present time.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Michigan has expired.

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. MURRAY].

SPECIAL PRIVILEGE FOR THE FEW AT THE EXPENSE OF THE MANY

Mr. MURRAY of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, let us analyze this proposed special-privilege legislation. For many years the Federal Treasury has been called upon to provide millions upon millions of dollars under a multitude of cotton legislative acts. Before the war, under crop controls, Federal funds given the farmers as payments were based on submission to the controls. During the war, with the controls suspended, the cotton farmer was a free producer. The reduction in the acreage or production is necessary for several reasons:

First. Is that normal exports are pretty much out of the picture, year after year export subsidy has been paid or else the cotton has been given away altogether.

Second. A near embargo on imports has been erected to prevent importations as only the 135,000 bales of short staple cotton can be imported. Evidently our cotton friends vote for reciprocal trade treaties, but for the other fellow.

Third. The cotton crop has gradually come under the mass production right in the face of a reduced market. Cotton-picking machines have intensified the social problems involved. Thirty thousand people are without jobs in one California cotton valley today.

Fourth. The present law, alloting 21,000,000 acres, will provide about 3,000,000 bales more than is needed for domestic need and for exports and carry-over, according to the PMA. The Department seemed to think 18,000,000 acres were sufficient. These 3,000,000 bales represents some $450,000,000.

Fifth. The Cooley resolution, according to the PMA, will provide at a minimum estimate of the PMA an additional 750,000 bales, which will mean a minimum of another $112,500,000 out of the United States Treasury. This is in addition to the $450,000,000 worth of cotton estimated to be produced where its only home apparently will be found by giving it away.

Sixth. Cotton farming is a sick industry. It has taken enormous amounts of the taxpayers' money to support the program. It evidently will require other untold millions to provide funds to keep King Cotton in the style it wishes to be supported. There will surely be a shortage of funds for supporting the other 95 percent of American agriculture.

Seventh. The cotton people are faced with a serious problem. They face a declining demand for their product. They most assuredly are faced with a rural social problem. The people who have lived and made a living on these 6,000,000 acres are faced with a serious problem. Are you going to solve it by providing a 90-percent parity support for 70 percent of the production on a million or a seven and one-half million dollar cotton farm? Are we to solve it by providing the little producer a quota of 2½ bales or 5 acres and the big operators a quota or an allotment of 1,000 to 3,000 bales? As serious as this problem is on this cotton section, the facts are that cotton farmers are not asked to face problems as serious as some other farm groups face. Did you ever figure out how many public funds will be needed to support the cotton on the Clayton-Anderson seven and one-half million dollar California farm?

Eighth. Let us spend a few minutes to see what is taking place in the other 95 percent of American agriculture. What is to become of the people living on the 10,175,000 acres of land that the wheat farmer has been asked to reduce his acreage on? What is to become of the corn farmers on the 11,350,000 acres that corn is being reduced? How about the bean farmer with the 370,000 acres removed from the bean acreage? How about the rice farmer with the 249,000 reduction in acreage?

Ninth. How about the fifteen to twenty million acres of land that the dairy farmer will not need due to the invasion and infiltration of vegetable oils in the production of the synthetic dairy products? Where will the quarter of a million dairy farmers that have already been eliminated by the vegetable-oil interests really find a job? Three million dairy cows have already been eliminated. These unneeded cotton growers cannot be shifted to the dairy business because this administration is putting dairy farmers out of business faster than it can put them into the dairy business.

Tenth. How about the acreage displaced by the importation of competitive agricultural products? These imports of competitive agricultural products represented over $1,530,000,000 during the past fiscal year without adding the fur imports. Does this replace twenty-five or thirty million acres of domestic land?

My opinion is that while this cotton situation is serious, it is not as serious as these other agricultural groups must face. With a program under the present law that will take $450,000,000 out of the Federal Treasury for 3,000,000 bales of cotton for which there isn't any use or demand, it should be evident that there is no reason to provide another $112,500,000. When one realizes that all the import duties on all articles and products imported represents but from $380,000,000 to $450,000,000 a year, it is evident that it does not make sense to spend an equal amount on a program for one crop—cotton. Remember cotton needed for domestic consumption does not represent over 5 percent of the national farm income. The time has arrived when we should recognize that all of agriculture is entitled to the same legislative consideration. Last fiscal year we imported over $497,000,000 worth of livestock products, including over 532,000 head of live cattle on the hoof and gave away over $500,000,000 worth of cotton. This just does not make sense.

There isn't any use of wasting time and energy in writing or talking about any economy program or paying any attention to the report of the bipartisan Hoover Commission and then turn around and vote to add $112,500,000 to the public debt as a result of this special-privilege legislation.

If cotton is to be provided a half-billion-dollar annual subsidy, then a straight across-the-board subsidy would cost 20 times as much, or 10 billions per year. This will be a sure method of destroying the support program.

The prewar agricultural program was upside down, and this is a continuation of this same formula. The production of soil-depleting crops are and have been stimulated by special-privilege legislation. This special-privilege legislation included direct payments and subsidized exports not accorded the other agricultural products. The program has lost sight of the family-sized farm as a basis of a healthy agricultral economy. The program provided over one-fourth million dollars to one wheat grower and over three-fourths million dollars to one cotton-farming outfit. While this was happening, the little farmer and, in fact, the average farmer, in some cases, has been asked to produce less and less. The Eighty-first Congress even raised the direct AAA subsidy to the big producer to $2,500, after years of effort that had made us lower this subsidy to $750.

While much talk is in the air about cutting the ECA by a billion dollars as an indication of interest in economy, it surely does not make economic sense to unnecessarily spend other billions of dollars in subsidizing agricultural products for which there is no market or need, and which cost fifteen to twenty million per month for storage charges.

I believe in a support program. I believe in one based on common sense—one that makes economic sense. The support program is comparable to the unemployment insurance in the industrial area. It all comes from the people.

I would not oppose this or any other bill without a constructive substitute. Constructive proposals are: (1) To extend wage-and-hour legislation to agricultural labor; (2) to extend social security to the rural people; (3) to provide unemployment insurance to farm labor comparable to unemployment insurance for other groups; (4) to discontinue the legal or illegal importation of foreign labor with the resulting social-unemployment problem. This especially applies when millions of Americans are now unemployed. (5) Support should be confined to farmers and not to speculator interests. We need a farmer program and not a landowners' program.

If the above were put into effect, the family-sized farm would have some chance. If the big operator can get a guaranteed support price for his produce, use temporary labor, shift this labor over to the relief rolls, and get a $2,500 subsidy under any disguise, overproduction can be expected to continue.

The embarassing surpluses are now being created by a conparatively few large operators. These surpluses are now costing the taxpayers millions of dollars to accumulate and in storage charges. The storage charges are from $15,000,000 to $20,000,000 per month, according to the A. P. These unneeded surpluses are responsible for the unnecessary social problems. The sooner we legislate for the benefit of the average farmer, and the general welfare of our people, the quicker this problem will be solved. The present cotton law supports the big operator for a 1,000- or 3,000-bale crop, while the small operator is limited to 2½ bales or 5 acres.

This legislation is a step backward. Cotton already has a mandatory support of 90 percent of parity in the 1949 act, has special-privilege legislation, which they have always had, and which is not extended to other more important crops and agricultural products. Some of these other more important crops haven't any mandatory supports whatsoever and some 75 percent of parity. Eggs in many sections today are bringing 39 percent of parity as an example. We should have a constructive approach and treat all of the agricultural groups equally and forget the special-privilege sectionalism that is so apparent today and includes this resolution.

I wish to state to my colleagues that our former colleague the Honorable Henry Steagall of Alabama made the greatest contribution to agricultural legislation that has ever been provided by any Member of Congress in my memory. Mr. Steagall was not thinking or legislating on a narrow sectional basis. He broadened the agricultural horizon of agricultural legislation. It was not his proposal to up the cotton support to 92½ percent of parity and provide less for other agricultural products. That was put in by Senator Bankhead.

I repeat that when Mr. Steagall and his committee revamped the Gore proposal and passed the amendment to the Price Control Act, he provided the only straight-across-the-board legislative proposal ever enacted by any Congress. His attitude, his broadminded approach not only provided the foods and fiber for the war but he also looked ahead and put in the 2-year-after-the-war protection. This of course was followed by the Hope bill which bill was in effect the same as the Steagall approach.

We have an international wheat agreement. The wheat is to have a two-price system. The wheat that goes into the world wheat pool is to be lower in price. The allotment to the pool is a cushion to protect the American people in case of a disastrously small crop. Why not an international agricultural agreement proposed by the FAO and men by Mr. Albert Goss of the Grange?

The days of duties and reciprocal-trade treaties should give way to the international agricultural agreement approach.

Cotton, with its 90 percent of guarantee should be satisfied, without promoting a new gadget. This should be most apparent when eggs are 39 percent of parity in the Midwest, and the poultry industry was a $3,000,000,000 industry in 1948, or providing over 10 percent of the Nation's farm marketings. This is twice the amount of the value of the cotton crop needed for domestic consumption.

Let us not continue to pour millions upon millions of dollars into and for an upside-down uneconomic program as exemplified by this cotton resolution.

In conclusion, may I state that if any Member wishes to ruin the support program, wishes to waste funds on a program that is contrary to the CCC attitude, and wishes to support special-privilege legislation for any crop or commodity, that is a responsibility he must assume. My only purpose, as a member of the committee, has been and is to present the facts. That is my responsibility and I assume this responsibility and will not act as a schoolboy, trying to blame someone else for everything that happens.

My position on this resolution remember is based on the testimony of the Agricultural Department and is not influenced by any partisan or sectional considerations.

Mr. Chairman, I do not want to introduce a slightly discordant note into what is going on here, but I am surely opposed to this resolution. All it does is add insult to injury.

Before I start, I do not want anybody to get the impression this has anything to do with the little controversy we had on oleomargarine, because I hope I am not of that temperament or that disposition.

I have here a speech I happened to run across the other day that I gave the first session I was here, in which I point out the same things I am going to try to point out today, except that today I hope to add some more ammunition to it.

At that time I called attention to the fact that we had an agricultural program that was upside down. We are pouring our millions and billions of dollars into a system of agriculture that just does not make sense. The amount of money that was funneled out to the different States was based on the kind of crops they happened to raise. I called attention at that time to the fact that one State had 11 percent of the so-called subsidy up to that time. This was nearly $400,000,000, and that the part that went back to the States was not based altogether on cotton by any means, because the wheat people had been just as big grabbers as the cotton people had been.

I can assure you there is no partisanship on my part. When this little horse trade is made and the wheat bill comes out, I will try to point it out to you again at that time.

I have a letter from one of my constituents who has an 80-acre farm. He says, "Dear friend, I have $360 of taxes on my 80-acre farm." I would just like to know why I should pour my money down this rat hole or any other rat hole.

You remember on the Hit Parade the last 3 weeks the first prize has always gone to "Dear Hearts and Gentle People." There seems to be a lot of goodness in the United States left, or else it would not be at the head of the parade all the time. That is the spirit in which I approach this issue here today.

My point is that we have an upside-down agricultural program. We are asked to take a step backward. I do not know any reason in the world that I would want to add to the public debt or be a party to adding between one-hundred and one-hundred fifty million dollars to that public debt. I will be glad to yield to anybody to tell me why I should when I have a constituent with an 80-acre farm that is farming his own farm and is not farming the United States Treasury, and paying $360 in taxes a year.

For many years the Federal Treasury has been called upon to provide millions upon millions of dollars under a multitude of cotton legislative acts. Before the war, under crop controls, Federal funds given the farmers as payments were based on submission to the controls. During the war, with the controls suspended, the cotton farmer was a free producer. The reduction in the acreage or production is necessary now for several reasons.

You should remember that the cotton people have not kept their house in order as the tobacco people have. They just kind of went merrily along during this whole period. This control operation should have been put in operation 3 or 4 years ago.

As a Republican, I do not like to have to take the position today that I have to defend the Department of Agriculture, but the things I am going to say here are in defense of the Department of Agriculture and the position they have taken on this legislation. The proposal first was for 18,000,000 acres of cotton. They raised it to 21,000,000. I did not think it was going to cost $450,000,000 to produce that much worth of cotton we did not have any use for, or I do not think I would have voted for it at that time. But I surely do not want to be in a position now of adding another one-hundred or one-hundred-fifty million dollars to this loss the United States Treasury must take.

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MURRAY of Wisconsin. I yield.

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRFSEN. I believe instead of 18,000,000 acres the officials of the Department said 16,000,000 acres. I checked that today with Mr. Wooley.

Mr. MURRAY of Wisconsin. At least in the testimony I heard 18,000,000 acres was the figure. That is all I know and that is what I obtained from the hearings. Normal exports of cotton are pretty well out of the picture. About the only market we have now is to give it away. If any Member here who wishes to give away a half a billion dollars' worth of cotton as we have during the last year and import $497,000,000 worth of livestock and livestock products it is his responsibility. Remember, that today we are considering a crop which is a special privilege crop. We are considering a crop that has reciprocal trade treaties for the other fellows, since only 135,000 bales of short staple cotton can come into the United States. Cotton has 90 percent of parity support under the present law. But how about the rest of agriculture? Some of them do not have any mandatory supports whatsoever. Before anybody gets too many buckets full of tears around here what do they think about the 39 percent of parity and 20 cents a dozen for eggs in the Midwest at this very hour?

The poultry industry is twice as important as the cotton industry, insofar as domestic needs are concerned.

Now the cotton crop is scheduled to come under mass production right in the face of a reduced market. The cotton picking machines have intensified the social problems involved. It is reliably reported by the Christian Science Monitor that 30,000 people are without jobs in one California cotton valley today. The present law allowing 21,000,000 acres will provide 3,000,000 bales more than is needed for domestic needs; and for exports the carry-over, according to the PMA. I will yield to anyone who says that is not what the PMA says. That is their testimony. The Department seemed to think 18,000,000 acres was truly sufficient and that these 3,000,000 bales represented $450,000,000. It looks as if not many people know how much $450,000,000 is any more.

Mr. WHITE of California. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield? I know he wants the record to be straight.

Mr. MURRAY of Wisconsin. The gentleman always wants the record straight.

Mr. WHITE of California. Three million acres does not give 3,000,000 bales. The production of cotton is only slightly over half a bale to an acre.

Mr. MURRAY of Wisconsin. Allowing 21,000,000 acres will provide about 3,000,000 bales more than is needed for domestic needs, exports and carry over. That is what I stated and that is what the PMA stated.

Mr. WHITE of California. For domestic needs the gentleman is speaking about now.

Mr. MURRAY of Wisconsin. Oh, yes, I said that before. The record will show that. I was reading what it said. I was reading my own writing.

Mr. WHITE of California. While the gentleman has yielded to me, will he allow me to make this observation? The gentleman speaks about the tremendous cost.

Mr. MURRAY of Wisconsin. I will yield to the gentleman for a question. I cannot yield to the gentleman for anything else except a question.

Mr. WHITE of California. Then I will ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. MURRAY of Wisconsin. I yield to the gentleman for a question.

Mr. WHITE of California. Does not the gentleman know that the cotton program has not cost the taxpayers of this Nation a penny, but has shown a profit of $150,000,000?

Mr. MURRAY of Wisconsin. That statement does not make sense. Cotton cost the American taxpayer over $500,000,000 last year. I presume we have not even a public debt either.

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MURRAY of Wisconsin. I yield.

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. The gentleman from California knows the reason the Commodity Credit Corporation is not showing a loss is because the taxpayers have footed the bill under ECA which has purchased the cotton to give it away.

Mr. COOLEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MURRAY of Wisconsin. I yield.

Mr. COOLEY. Does not the gentleman approve of the ECA? Did not the gentleman vote for the Marshall plan?

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. The gentleman did not vote for the appropriation.

Mr. COOLEY. The gentleman admits he was in the minority.

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. I am telling the gentleman, if the gentleman from Wisconsin will permit, there is no use trying to fool ourselves, the taxpayers have footed the bill, whether it has been through the ECA or otherwise.

Mr. COOLEY. Do you say that you voted to create an obligation and then voted against the appropriation?

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. That does not enter into the discussion at all. The taxpayers have to pay to get rid of the cotton and the tobacco also.

Mr. MURRAY of Wisconsin. I do not yield any further, Mr. Chairman.

5. The Cooley resolution, according to PMA, will provide a minimum of an additional 750,000 bales, which will mean a minimum of another $112,500,000.

That is the testimony of the Department of Agriculture. In the wheat bill last fall, the wheat acreage was increased to what was supposed to be a 2,000,000-acre increase, but it ended up with a 4,000,000-acre increase. This cotton gadget may do the same thing, too.

Mr. COOLEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MURRAY of Wisconsin. I yield for a question, or if you have any correction to make.

Mr. COOLEY. Is the gentleman, by any chance, afraid that if we reduce the cotton acreage we might go into the dairy business?

Mr. MURRAY of Wisconsin. I have the answer to that in here, but I will give it to you ahead of time. You cannot go into the dairy business because your committee and your administration has put and is putting dairy farmers out of the dairy business faster than you can put them in. You have already eliminated 3,000,000 dairy cows by promoting the production of 900,000,000 pounds of oleo and other synthetic dairy products. We have 242,000,000 less dairy cows than we had 15 years ago.

Mr. COOLEY. But the gentleman does have some apprehension that this might occur?

Mr. MURRAY of Wisconsin. Oh, no; no.

Mr. COOLEY. Then why do you object?

Mr. MURRAY of Wisconsin. Because you are wasting public money.

Mr. COOLEY. The fact of the matter is that on the basic commodities, the Commodity Credit Corporation has made millions of dollars in profit.

Mr. MURRAY of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, I just yielded for a question and not an answer. I have not said the CCC had lost any great amount on cotton but that the United States Treasury, the taxpayer, has lost untold millions. I have not finished one page yet. Let me go along here. Let me finish one page at least.

In other words, the present law requires $450,000,000 for cotton that we do not have any use for except to give it away. Let us get that straight. You do not need to tell me I voted for it, because I know it; but I did not know that it would be that much or I would not have voted for it. This is in addition to the minimum of $112,500,000 of cotton that is to be produced under this Cooley resolution.

Sixth. Cotton farming is a sick industry, and the sooner they wake up to it and start farming their farms and stop farming the United States Treasury the better off they will be and the better off the United States Treasury will be. In the country I come from they farm the farms first, and then if they can get a little out of the United States Treasury, all right, but they do not make it their main ambition in life to see what they can get out of the United States Treasury. The average subsidy is around $50 per year.

Mr. WORLEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MURRAY of Wisconsin. I yield.

Mr. WORLEY. I know the gentleman is for a support price on cotton and other basic commodities. We were wondering over here what is the latest support price for the great dairy industry which the gentleman so ably represents.

Mr. MURRAY of Wisconsin. I never admitted that the so-called basic commodities were really basic. The support for cotton and wheat and these special privileged crops is 90 percent, mandatory. The support on dairy products is from 75 to 90 percent, if they follow the law. The support on hogs which is three times as important as cotton has not any mandatory support whatsoever.

Mr. WORLEY. Do they not follow the law?

Mr. MURRAY of Wisconsin. Eggs at 20 cents per dozen and 39 percent of parity does not sound as if anyone is working at following the law too religiously.

Mr. WORLEY. Somebody said they were given more than the law allowed last year.

Mr. MURRAY of Wisconsin. I state that they did not follow the law last year. They frisked Wisconsin out of $25,000,000 to $50,000,000 because they did not follow the law last year. I will not say anything now until milk gets below 75 percent of parity. The law is 75 to 90 percent of parity for milk and its products.

Mr. WORLEY. But you say that to support basic agricultural commodities is a special interest?

Mr. MURRAY of Wisconsin. I am not weak-minded enough to think that you have basic commodities in corn, cotton, rice, and tobacco, because they are not basic, in my book. Cotton only represents 5 percent of agriculture. The Agriculture Committee spends 95 percent of its time talking about it and the other 5 percent of its time dreaming about it, I guess. The reason I say that is this: The United States does not need over 8,000,000 bales of cotton, according to PMA, for domestic use; $150 a bale is $1,250,000,000. Five percent of the $30,000,000,000 total agricultural marketings for 1948 is $1,500,000,000. Therefore, what cotton is needed in the United States does not represent over 5 percent of American agriculture. Poultry represents 10 percent of American agriculture, and you are paying them 39 percent of parity for eggs in the Midwest today. They got 77 percent of parity even in the old bad days when Mr. Hoover was defeated for President. Incidentally, eggs were 20 cents a dozen then as they are today in the Midwest.

Mr. ABERNETHY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MURRAY of Wisconsin. It has taken an enormous amount of the taxpayers' money to support the cotton program. Evidently it will require other untold millions to provide funds to keep King Cotton in the style to which he has become accustomed. Yet they are going to take many millions more to keep King Cotton living in the style they wish him to live in. There will surely be a shortage of funds for supporting the other 95 percent of agriculture if most of the funds are to be spent on cotton and other misnamed basic commodities that do not when added together equal one-fourth of American agriculture.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin has expired.

Mr. McCARTHY. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that a quorum is not present.

Mr. COOLEY. Mr. Chairman, in view of the point of no quorum I move that the Committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the Committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. SMITH of Virginia, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union, reported that that Committee, having had under consideration House Joint Resolution 398, relating to cotton- and peanut-acreage allotments and marketing quotas under the Agricultural Adjustment Act of 1938, as amended, had come to no resolution thereon.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. VURSELL (at the request of Mr. HILL) was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include an article.

Mr. WOLCOTT asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include an address made by Dr. John A. Hannah, president of the Michigan State College of Agriculture and Applied Science.

Mr. O'SULLIVAN asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD and include extraneous matter.

The SPEAKER. Under the previous order of the House, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DAVENPORT] is recognized for 5 minutes.

WASHINGTON REPORTING

Mr. DAVENPORT. Mr. Speaker, last Friday the House of Representatives, by a vote of 236 to 183, prevented a small oligarchy of seven Members from determining what future legislation could be voted upon by the House.

It sounds fantastic that any such tiny group of men would attempt to push democracy back to the ice age. And it sounds even more unbelievable that for a time it looked as if they would succeed. It was only with a unified drive to stem this undemocratic tide that democracy was saved for the elected representatives of the American people.

On its surface the issue was a simple one. The Rules Committee of the House of Representatives wanted the House to pass a resolution to permit it to determine what bills would be allowed on the floor for vote. It said in effect that it knew better what was good for the country than the other 423 Members of the House. The Rules Committee consists of 12 members, 8 Democrats and 4 Republicans. A simple majority of seven would, in effect, control the legislation of the House of Representatives.

It is a tribute to HERMAN P. EBERHARTER, my colleague in Congress from Pittsburgh, that this sinister effort failed. Not only did he play a key role in preventing Congress from backsliding but it was he who was originally responsible for stripping the Rules Committee of its 50-year life-and-death hold on Congress. His colleagues on the Hill now hail him as the man who returned democracy to the House and fought to maintain it when it was challenged.

When the Eightieth Congress ended its do-nothing activities and the people elected President Truman in 1948, the gentleman from Pennsylvania, Congressman EBERHARTER, was concerned that the Rules Committee would sit on vital legislation in the Eighty-first Congress. Even before the new Congress convened, he organized a committee of seven Congressmen to function as the Informal Rules Reform Committee. He knew that something would have to be done to force the Rules Committee to return to its original function as traffic director of legislation. Through the years it had acquired policy-making power and not only determined when bills would be brought up for a vote, but what bills would be brought out.

Following a thorough investigation the gentleman from Pennsylvania, Congressman EBERHARTER, came up with a satisfying solution to the autocracy of the Rules Committee. It is this: When any of the 19 standing committees of the House reports out a bill, the Rules Committee has only 21 days in which to schedule debate on that bill by the full House. If the Rules Committee does not act within the 21 days, the committee chairman originally reporting out the bill can obtain recognition from the Speaker of the House to have his fellow Congressmen debate the measure.

The Eberharter solution to the 50-year problem of the all-powerful Rules Committee passed the Democratic Party caucus on January 1, 1949, and was approved by the House of Representatives on January 3, 1949, by a vote of 275 to 142.

The net effect of the Eberharter law was twofold. The Rules Committee went back to being a traffic manager for legislation, requiring only four uses of the 21-day rule. One of these dealt with the anti-poll-tax bill and the other with the river and harbor measure. But as the Eighty-first Congress put on age, a small brush fire within the Rules Committee finally burst into flames. Committee resentment grew and by the time the second session of this Congress convened, nine of its members plotted to do away with the Eberharter law and win back their old authority.

This required the Herculean effort of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, Congressman EBERHARTER, to thwart their plan. I worked alongside him to arouse the Members of the House of the significance of the issue. And today, with the issue settled, I am proud of Pittsburgh for electing a man of the caliber of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, HERMAN EBERHARTER, to Congress.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. MILLER of California and Mr. MURRAY of Wisconsin asked and were given permission to extend their remarks in the RECORD.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to Mr. WAGNER (at the request of Mr. WELCH), for 1 day, on account of official business.

SENATE

MONDAY, JANUARY 30, 1950

(Legislative day of Wednesday, January 4, 1950)

The Senate met at 12 o'clock meridian, on the expiration of the recess.

The Chaplain, Rev. Frederick Brown Harris, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Lord of all life, in the white light of Thy searching we would pause at the day's threshold to examine our inner desires and motives; that in this temple of democracy we may stand with pure hearts and clean hands. May we be saved from the dangers that lurk in warped judgments and in narrow loyalties.

Inspire and guide with the spirit of understanding these Thy servants, the few among the many lifted by their fellows to high pedestals of power and influence in a great and crucial day. May their counsels so laden with possibilities to affect this stricken generation add to the world's store of good will, and may their words be for the healing of the nations. We ask it in the dear Redeemer's name. Amen.

PROHIBITION OF LIQUOR ADVERTISING—PETITION

Mr. GREEN. Mr. President, I present for appropriate reference and ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a petition signed by Helen A. Thomas and sundry other citizens of West Barrington and Riverside, R. I., praying for the enactment of Senate bill 1847, to prohibit the transportation of alcohol beverage advertising in interstate commerce.

There being no objection, the petition was received, referred to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

To our Senators and Representatives in Congress:

We respectfully request that you use your influence and vote for the passage of a bill to prohibit the transportation of alcoholic beverage advertising in interstate commerce and the broadcasting of alcoholic beverage advertising over the radio, covered by bill S. 1847. The most pernicious effect of this advertising is the constant invitation and enticement to drink. The American people spent $9,640,000,000 for alcoholic beverages in 1947 as compared with $7,770,000,000 in 1945. During the same time there was a corresponding increase each year in crime, juvenile delinquency, broken homes, deaths and injuries due to intoxicated drivers. There is every reason why this waste of money and of human values should not be increased but rather greatly decreased.

REPORTS OF A COMMITTEE

The following reports of a committee were submitted:

S. 1950. A bill to reimburse the Fisher Contracting Co.; with an amendment (Rept. No. 1244);

AMENDMENT OF UNITED STATES CODE RELATING TO ESPIONAGE AND CENSORSHIP

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, I introduce for appropriate reference a bill to extend the statute of limitations in peacetime espionage cases and ask unanimous consent that a brief statement which I have prepared on the bill be printed at this point in the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be received and appropriately referred, and, without objection, the statement presented by the Senator from Wisconsin will be printed in the RECORD.

The bill (S. 2941) to amend chapter 37 of title 18, United States Code, relating to espionage and censorship, introduced by Mr. WILEY, was received, read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

STATEMENT BY SENATOR WILEY ON ANTI-ESPIONAGE BILL

The Nation has followed with deep attention the developments in the Alger Hiss case. One of the factors which the American people have noted is that the statute of limitations ran out, so that the Government was unable to prosecute Mr. Hiss for actual deeds of espionage, but had to content itself with trying him for perjury.

I personally feel that it is ridiculous that we should have the present 3-year statute of limitations on peacetime espionage cases. In wartime, of course, espionage is a capital offense, and there is no such statute of limitations whatsoever. Security legislation has been sent up to the Congress and has been pending before us for some time which would extend the peacetime limit indefinitely. I believe that this subject merits the most sympathetic attention and the promptest possible action on the part of the Congress. Since, however, previous security legislation has been of a very broad and complicated nature, I personally have attempted to focus attention on this single issue of statute of limitations and have accordingly drafted a very simple bill which merely makes the statute 6 years rather than 3 years.

If, however, my colleagues feel that the statute should be made so as to run indefinitely, that would be perfectly all right with me. The big challenge is, however, to enact some statute immediately which will remedy the present situation.

We must recognize that in the atomic age we cannot use "horse and buggy" legal weapons against saboteurs and spies. The Federal Bureau of Investigation must be given the finest possible legal instruments to do its vital job, and I believe that one such instrument is the bill which I am introducing today.

SMALL BUSINESS COORDINATOR

Mr. MAYBANK. Mr. President, I introduce for appropriate reference a bill providing for the appointment of a Small Business Coordinator in the Executive Office of the President and I ask unanimous consent that a sectional summary of the bill be printed in the RECORD.

The coordinator would be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. The bill is one of the results of a study of the needs of small-business men by the staff of the Small Business Subcommittee of the Banking and Currency Committee.

The appointment of a Small Business Coordinator is designed to give relief to those small-business men who are finding it increasingly difficult to obtain necessary information which would enable them to participate in the huge volume of Government contracts. The coordinator will be directed to assist the President in the coordination of the activities of all executive agencies in furtherance of the interests of independent small-business concerns. The bill further directs that existing facilities and personnel of executive agencies shall be used to the fullest extent practicable.

The bill is being introduced and recommended to the Senate as a result of constant association with and investigation of one of the hindrances to small-business men with which the subcommittee has been concerned.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be received and appropriately referred, and, without objection, the summary presented by the Senator from South Carolina will be printed in the RECORD.

The bill (S. 2943) to liberalize the lending policies of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation and of the Federal Reserve Banking System in favor of independent small-business enterprises; to adjust the registration provisions of the Securities Exchange Act, as amended, in order to enable independent small-business concerns to issue securities at a reasonable cost; to develop the productive facilities of the national economy; to further the interest of independent small-business enterprises; to provide for the appointment of a Small Business Coordinator; and for other purposes, introduced by Mr. MAYBANK, was received, read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

The sectional summary of the bill presented by Mr. MAYBANK is as follows:

SECTIONAL SUMMARY OF BILL ESTABLISHING A SMALL BUSINESS COORDINATOR

SECTION 1

(a) Establishes in the Executive Office of the President a Small Business Coordinator at an annual salary of $15,000.

(b) Provides that the Coordinator shall assist the President in the coordination of the activities of the executive agencies in furtherance of the interests of small-business concerns.

(c) To the fullest extent practicable, the Coordinator shall utilize the facilities and personnel of other executive agencies.

He may appoint, not to exceed six deputies, specialists, or other experts, at not to exceed $14,000 per annum for one of such, and not to exceed $12,000 per annum for the other five.

(d) To the fullest extent practicable, the Coordinator shall utilize the facilities of the small-business advisory boards in the Federal agencies, and he may utilize the services of Federal and, with their consent, State, regional, and local agencies.

SECTION 2

The Coordinator is directed, whenever and to the extent that he determines such action necessary—

(1) With the cooperation of existing agencies, to make a complete study of the productive facilities of independent small-business enterprises, and to develop a definite criterion to determine what is an independent small-business enterprise, and to recommend to the Congress the enactment of a clear definition of small business that will be uniformly interpreted by all executive agencies.

(2), (3), (4) To assist independent small-business enterprises to obtain a fair share of Government contracts and to cut through bureaucratic red tape in doing so.

SECTION 3

The Coordinator will consult with Federal, State, and local agencies, with independent small-business enterprises and associations thereof with a view to recommending to the Congress appropriate legislation designed to further the interests of independent small-business enterprises, including, but not limited to—

(1) the offering of more liberal terms by the RFC in respect to loans to independent small-business enterprises;

(2) the adaptation of section 13b of the Federal Reserve Act to the present credit needs of independent small business;

(3) the adjustment of the SEC Act and regulations to the problems of independent small business;

(4) the revamping of the Federal-income-tax structure in order to foster the growth of small business;

(5) the development of a system of Government insurance at reasonable rates to relieve independent small business of the financial hardships caused by the shortage of dollars in foreign countries;

(6) the formulation of a program to insure that independent small business obtain its fair share of Government contracts.

However, the bill states that the above activities are to be carried out in a manner consistent with our traditional national system of free enterprise. The bill states that the Congress is fully aware of the fact that the eventual success of independent small business is dependent upon its ability to compete in the market place and that the Government should limit its endeavors to the removal of barriers which impede small business in its efforts to compete fairly and equitably with larger business of equal benefit to the national welfare.

SECTION 4

Provides for a detailed report every 90 days to be forwarded by the Coordinator to the President, Senate, and House.

SECTIONS 5 AND 6

Usual technical provisions authorizing appropriations and providing a separability clause for constitutional interpretation.

FEDERAL OLD-AGE AND SURVIVORS INSURANCE SYSTEM AND SOCIAL SECURITY ACT—AMENDMENTS

Mr. LEHMAN. Mr. President, today at the request of thousands of New York policemen, firemen, teachers and other State employees, I submit amendments intended to be proposed by me to the bill (H. R. 6000) to extend and improve the Federal Old-Age and Survivors Insurance System, to amend the public-assistance and child-welfare provisions of the Social Security Act, and for other purposes, which would exempt public employees already covered by a retirement system from inclusion in the old-age-pension provisions of the Social Security Act.

Under the present provisions of H. R. 6000 all these public employees could be blanketed under the Federal-old-age-pension system if two-thirds of those voting, in a specially held election, were to cast their votes for such an arrangement.

The policemen, the firemen, teachers and other public employees have demonstrated to me an almost unanimous unwillingness to run the risk of losing the systems under which they now operate, by election or any other means. They have asked that they be completely exempted from Federal coverage.

H. R. 6000 sets up a complex provision for Federal-State compacts to effectuate the transfer of the coverage to the Federal Government. However, I am strongly inclined to agree with the policemen and firemen that if they are already protected, and adequately so, and do not wish to be included in the Federal Government system, Federal legislation on this subject would be extraneous and possibly dangerous.

I shall urge the Senate Finance Committee to consider and approve the amendments which I am submitting. I can see very little justification for including these people if they do not wish to be included. I do not think the Federal Government should be in a position of forcing, or urging people to be covered by Federal pension systems if they believe themselves to be adequately covered—and are in fact so covered—by existing local systems.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendments submitted by the Senator from New York will be received, printed, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, I wish to make a short statement, and I should like to have all Senators present listen to it. When unanimous consent is granted that Senators may present matters for the RECORD, without debate, Senators may merely present petitions and memorials, introduce bills and resolutions, and present matters for the RECORD without speeches or without debate. That limitation is a portion of the unanimous-consent agreement. I call that fact to the attention of all Senators, because if Senators are going to make speeches in connection with every bill they introduce, or other matter presented, a very long time will be consumed. I merely call that lim'tation to the attention of all Senators.

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, will the Senator from Michigan yield so I may propound a question to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. FERGUSON. I yield.

Mr. McCARRAN. Does the Senator from Illinois by his remarks mean that no explanation of a matter proposed to be inserted in the RECORD shall be made?

Mr. LUCAS. Let me make a brief statement in reply to the Senator from Nevada, if I may do so without violating any of the proprieties or jeopardizing the rights of the Senator from Michigan, who now has the floor. In other words, after bills and joint resolutions have been introduced and other matters presented for the RECORD, a Senator can secure the floor and speak as long as he wants to. I would not even object to a short explanation being made in connection with a bill, but I will say that if short explanations are indulged in it will not be long before long explanations are made, and before we know it much of the time of the Senate will be consumed which, under a unanimous-consent agreement of this kind, should not be consumed.

The Senator from Michigan has the floor, and he was gracious enough to yield to me in order that I could present a unanimous request to allow all Senators to present matters for the RECORD and introduce bills, and so forth, at this time.

Mr. ROBERTSON. Mr. President, will the Senator from Michigan yield?

Mr. FERGUSON. I yield to the Senator from Virginia.

Mr. ROBERTSON. As I understand, it is admissible under the rules and under the present unanimous-consent agreement for Senators who wish explanations of bills they present to appear in the RECORD in connection with the presentation of bills merely to ask unanimous consent that such explanations be inserted in the RECORD at the time the bills are presented.

Mr. LUCAS. That has been done, and it can be done under such a unanimous-consent agreement.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair regards it to be his duty to enforce the provisions of a unanimous-consent agreement entered into by the Senate, not only in respect to matters of a sort with which we are now dealing, but with respect to other matters, although now and then the Chair does not feel that he should crack down on Senators who have brief statements to make about matters they are presenting. A unanimous-consent request of the nature of the one just made, when agreed to, does bar explanations or speeches on bills introduced or other matters presented for the RECORD.

PROPOSED CHANGE IN METHOD OF ELECTION OF PRESIDENT AND VICE PRESIDENT—AMENDMENTS

Mr. FERGUSON submitted amendments intended to be proposed by him to the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 2) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States providing for the election of President and Vice President, which were ordered to lie on the table and to be printed.

AMENDMENT OF INTERNAL REVENUE CODE—AMENDMENT

Mr. JOHNSON of Colorado submitted an amendment in the nature of a substitute intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. 6073) to amend section 501 (b) (6) of the Internal Revenue Code, which was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed.

HOUSE JOINT RESOLUTION REFERRED

The joint resolution (H. J. Res. 371) to correct the formula used in computing the income taxes of life-insurance companies for 1947, 1948, and 1949, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

FEDERAL DEPOSIT INSURANCE CORPORATION BUILDING—CHANGE OF REFERENCE

Mr. MAYBANK. Mr. President, on January 25, I introduced a bill (S. 2923) to authorize the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation to acquire or construct, with its own funds, a building within the District of Columbia suitable for the Corporation.

The Banking and Currency Committee is today completing hearings on a FDIC bill of which this language was a part. It was the unanimous opinion of the members of the subcommittee that although they favor the acquisition of the building, under the authority of the Reorganization Act a matter such as the authorization of a building within the District of Columbia should be referred to the Committee on Public Works.

Therefore, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Banking and Currency be discharged from the further consideration of the bill and that it be appropriately rereferred.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from South Carolina? The Chair hears none, and the Committee on Banking and Currency is discharged from the further consideration of the bill, and it will be referred to the Committee on Public Works.

RELIEF OF CERTAIN EMPLOYEES AND FORMER EMPLOYEES OF NAVAL ORDNANCE PLANT, POCATELLO, IDAHO—CHANGE OF REFERENCE

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, on March 11, 1949, S. 1224, for the relief of certain employees and former employees of the Naval Ordnance Plant, Pocatello, Idaho, was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

A report was requested from the Government agency involved in this legislation which is now before the committee.

S. 1224 was considered at the regular meeting of the committee held Monday, January 30, 1950, and on motion of Senator LANGER, with the approval of the committee, it was determined that the subject matter of the above-mentioned bill is one that comes more properly within the jurisdiction of the Committee on Post Office and Civil Service.

On behalf of the Committee on the Judiciary I request that the committee be discharged from the further consideration of S. 1224, and that it be referred to the Committee on Post Office and Civil Service.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Nevada? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

At the indicated time and place all persons interested in the nomination may make such representations as may be pertinent. The subcommittee consists of the Senator from Nevada [Mr. McCARRAN], chairman, the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. KEFAUVER], and the Senator from Missouri [Mr. DONNELL].

ADDRESS BY THE VICE PRESIDENT AT ANNUAL MEETING OF UNITED SERVICE FOR NEW AMERICANS

Mr. LEHMAN. Mr. President, on January 15, our eminent presiding officer, the Vice President of the United States, made a speech on displaced persons and on displaced-persons legislation, before the annual meeting of the United Service for New Americans, Inc., at the Hotel Astor, New York City. It was a fine speech, a noble speech from a noble heart, dealing with problems which call for a great heart. I ask unanimous consent to have the address printed in the RECORD at this point in my remarks.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Mr. President, ladies, and gentlemen, I am greatly pleased and complimented that I was invited to participate in the discussion which is being carried on here today by the United Service for New Americans. It is a subject in which I have been interested for many years, even before the beginning or the end of World War II, and particularly since the conclusion of that great catastrophe. I suppose nobody will dispute the fact that World War II left in its wake a devastation, uprooting—physically, morally, mentally, socially, and politically—among populations all over the world which bequeathed to us one of the great problems of all times. And that is the problem of so readjusting the people of the world in their relationships, in their outlook upon life, in their opportunity to fulfill the destiny of man, as he was created in the beginning in the image of Almighty God, in order that from one generation to another man may hope to rise a little above the level and status of the preceding generation.

World War II went a long way toward destroying civilization. It did destroy the works of art, architecture, the stability of social responsibility in a sense, in vast areas of the world. And now the problem that faces mankind, not only here, but everywhere is to find some formula, reasonable and practicable, that will not only prevent the repetition of such a great disaster to the people of the world, but may set them on the permanent highway toward peace and understanding, cooperation, and working together so that ultimately bigotry and intolerance and hatred out of which wars and suffering usually flow may be at least assuaged, if not abolished, from the world. So, I cannot too greatly emphasize the work which is being done by the United Service for New Americans. Without this coordinated service, without this voluntary, and in many cases unrequited, toil under a formal organization that makes it practicable, there would be utter frustration, not only in undertaking to observe and enforce the law, desired to bring about a partial solution of this problem, but among those who are fortunate enough to reach this country, fortunate enough to escape the displaced-persons camps, to escape the atmosphere and the foundation and the environment of the hatred and intolerance and want in these countries which are involved, and any other countries to which they may have gone—temporarily or otherwise.

So, I congratulate this great organization, this great group of men and women who are in a sense going among the people, if not physically, at least theoretically, preaching the gospel to all creatures—the gospel of peace, the gospel of economic security, the gospel of fairness, of opportunity and of humanity, which it is. Now, I recognize the difficulties which face the American people and I am not unaware, of course, of the prejudices which in recent years have grown up against the admission of too many people into this country to the extent that our own economy would be endangered and our security would be jeopardized. That danger and fear has been intensified by the differences now existing throughout the world and the ideology which men follow. But I entertain no such fear on account of the program of the Displaced Persons Act, or of the United Service for New Americans or any other program, voluntary or otherwise, initiated and carried on by the fine, high type of character of the people who are engaged in this work and try to do something for the world.

Now, you are, of course, familiar with the fact that following the war the question had to be dealt with by the Congress, because under our migration laws and under the quota system, it was impossible for many of the most worthy of these refugees to find refuge in the United States. The quota system may be necessary, and it has been adopted by the policy of the Congress, under ordinary conditions. But a quota system does not always result in the admission of the best people into this country, especially after a world crisis. Many of these people who have been herded into camps escaped their own countries into which they were turned and which they left in order that they might escape the very conditions which they found intolerable in the homes of their fathers.

I have been in some of these DP camps in Europe. I have seen the type of men and women who were there. All of them, in all camps and in all countries, had the same high level of character and desirability. I have been in these camps in Germany. I have seen men, women, and children who came from Russia, who came out from Russia because they were unwilling to live under the intolerable conditions, and they have not been willing to go back because they were unwilling to submit themselves to the sort of regimentation and circumstances in which they were compelled to live there. I have seen the remains of the people who were the special object of Hitler's hatred. He tried to destroy and obliterate and exterminate these people, and nearly succeeded.

I have been in those camps, where I saw children being taught the lessons of history and many of them, in my judgment, are people that can become good citizens of the United States. I have seen these refugees in Italy and other countries. I had seen them in Austria 2 years ago. I have been in the DP camps in Germany, Austria, and in one or two instances, in Italy, and I have been inspired by the devotion, and sincerity, and the character of these people who are not willing to go back and are looking forward to the approach of the day when they may expect to leave.

In order to solve that problem, in a sense temporarily, the United States has contributed to the International Refugee Organization, to which reference has been made, $70,000,000 a year out of the taxes of the people and more than $200,000,000 altogether. As long as this problem faces us and as long as it faces the UN, which cannot abandon it in good faith, it is desirable that the problem be solved for these DP's who are worthy of resettlement, and that they be allowed to resettle in this country insofar as it can be done under the law, and wherever else it may be done, under the laws of other countries. Looking at it purely from the standpoint of practicality, it is related to the expenses of our Government, and at this time the expenses of our Government are important matters to be concerned about, that they are settled as promptly as possible and that they may be resettled in this country among our own people who want them.

The President, as you know, asked the Congress, in the effort to help solve this problem, to amend the immigration law to allow 400,000 of these displaced persons to come into the United States. A great many people thought he meant 400,000 a year. He meant no such thing. He meant a total of 400,000 people. The matter was debated in the Eightieth Congress bitterly. It was debated in the atmosphere of what was then a crisis in the disposition of these persons and in the world's attitude toward them. It was debated with more or less heat among those who desired to have liberal and to accept the responsibility of civilization and of Christianity in its fullest sense, but instead of enacting a law to permit 400,000 persons to come into this country, Congress rather grudgingly permitted 205,000, only half the number recommended by the President.

The President signed this bill, not because it was adequate, not because it was in accordance with his recommendations, but as he stated at the time he signed it because it was the only thing he could get at that time and it was a step in the right direction, though including prejudicial restrictions which have been unfair to many of those entitled to come into this country. In the judgment of the President—and I agree with him completely—it was particularly prejudicial to Catholics and Jews, and there were no grounds in the history of this country to justify such discrimination against them. But the law did recognize, however, our obligation, so far as it went. It was an acknowledgment of our leadership, at least of our participation among other nations in that leadership designed to lift the hope of these unfortunate people, many of whom I have seen myself trudge the highways of Europe, not knowing when night fell where they might rest their souls. Not only did the law, as far as it went, recognize our national obligation toward these people, it also established for them a quota system which is applicable to immigration generally. It did something else. It provided for the protection of our interests and our people and our social and political institutions by undertaking to protect our country against the infiltration of subversives who may take advantage of the law to try to come here. As far as the law went, forgetting for the moment the unfair and unjust discrimination to which the President called attention, the law was a step in the right direction, and, of course, it did serve a good purpose to that extent.

Now, the problem is its extension to increase the numbers which would be permitted to come in. The President, in his annual message and in other recommendations since the problem arose, has recommended 400,000 refugees, DP's, be admitted into this country. He did it in 1948; he did it again in 1949. He did it on January 4, 1950, in his annual message a couple of weeks ago. Now, the House of Representatives responded in the Eighty-first Congress to the recommendation of the President. It did not respond fully by accepting 400,000, but reduced the number to 339,000. (Just why they fixed it at 339,000 and not 340,000 I do not know. Another thousand would not have hurt much.) Now, that bill is before the Senate. I am not going into the parliamentary situation, because I may have to pass on it as President of the Senate, and I do not wish in any way to forecast what problem might arise and what my decision would be in such a situation. The Committee on the Judiciary did not act upon it. The Senate became impatient and was on the verge of voting on a motion to discharge the committee when the committee met and voted the bill out without recommendation and placed it on the calendar. It was taken up and debated for a week or so, and by a vote of 36 to 30 recommitted to the Committee on the Judiciary with the instructions to report it back by the 25th of January 1950. That day will soon approach.

The Senate may have an opportunity at an early date to give it further consideration. Of course, the Senate can amend the bill to include the entire 400,000 if it sees fit, raising the figures in the House bill. Compromises are always necessary in legislation where there is determined opposition, and I am not in a position to say whether the Senate will increase the number or not. I am not any longer a Member of the Senate. I have no vote except in the case of a tie, and any vote in the case of a tie is only effective if I favor something that is being voted on, because a tie vote defeats any proposition that is being voted on, since all matters must receive at least a majority. Therefore, my vote as President of the Senate counts for nothing on a tie vote unless I am in favor of it, and a vote in the affirmative gives it a majority of one vote.

But I can say this, and I say it because I believe it is in accordance with the facts: If the Senate had been permitted to vote on that bill in the last session, or if it is permitted to vote on it at this session, it will overwhelmingly adopt a new bill increasing the number which may come here and removing the restrictions and discriminations that are now in the present law.

Reference has been made here to the various criticisms and charges—I think the speaker who is an honored member of the Commission has adequately dealt with them (Henry Rosenfield, DP Commissioner), and I do not feel it necessary to reiterate and repeat, except I do wish to say this: There have never been in my judgment, in the whole history of the United States, a more careful piece of machinery of inspection and investigation than is now in effect in regard to the administration of these displaced persons in the United States. Our Army, through its counter-intelligence service, all of our consuls abroad who have to pass upon visas, the Federal Bureau of Investigation, the Department of Justice, the Immigration Service, everywhere—here and elsewhere—and many others which I might mention, are a part of this screening process. I do not know how there would be any better system of investigation by which it could be determined that those who are permitted to come are entitled to come. And none of these services, none of these agencies, none of these organizations, whether they are governmental or voluntary, either approve of or permit anybody to come under the displaced-persons program who either is now, or ever has been, a member of the Communist Party, who now is, or ever was, a Nazi or a Fascist. They just can't get in. Now there are recesses in the brain in which opinions and convictions sometimes are harbored that nobody knows anything about, because there is no mirror by which you can look into a man's mind to tell what he is thinking. There are phrenologists who pretend to know that, but I have always doubted it. It might be possible that out of 205,000 people, out of 400,000, somebody now and then might slip in who was not the sort of person we wanted to be amalgamated into the citizenship of the United States.

This program has been endorsed by so many organizations, and its administration has been helped by the cooperation of these organizations to such an extent, that I do not entertain any fear as to the character, the loyalty, or those who are permitted to come.

I do not believe the great Catholic Church, the Council of Churches of Christ in America, which is the Protestant organization of the churches of the United States, that the Synagogue Council representing the Jewish Synagogue in this country, that the American Federation of Labor, the Congress of Industrial Organizations, which is always anxious and alert to protect the interests of their people and who are now within their organization fighting for the elimination of all subversive elements within their organization—would endorse either the enactment or the perpetuation of a law that under its administration or provisions would undermine the foundations of American liberty, American democracy, and American humanity.

I am among those, and have been all along, who have actively supported the recommendation of the President and am doing so now. I express the hope that before this Congress shall act, before it adjourns, before this law shall have expired, and before we are confronted with the inhuman proposition that nearly a quarter of a million worthy men, women, and children who are worthy of American citizenship are to be stranded and again huddled anywhere in Europe because of our prejudice and unwillingness to take them in and make them not only good citizens of America, which they want to be, but good citizens of the world, which they have a right to be.

We are faced with a great duty, a great obligation. Whether we wanted it or not, the leadership of the world has, in many respects, been placed in our hands.

Destiny had something to do with it. Fate had something to do with it. The unification of the world from the standpoint of physical connections, the interdependence of men and women upon other men and women of other communities, of one country and state upon another country and state, and one nation upon other nations—have centered the responsibility of leadership and guidance in the people of the United States. It is a tremendous obligation. It is a tremendous challenge to our ability and our willingness to help preserve the institutions out of which come freedom of the soul, freedom of worship, freedom of speech, freedom of assembly, freedom of the press, and all the freedoms which we have cherished for a century and a half, to which have been added other freedoms and other desires for freedom—freedom from want and freedom from fear. Some poet has beautifully said, "He who stoops to lift the fallen does not stoop but stands erect." That is true of organizations no less than men. It is true of voluntary organizations, it is true of states, it is true of nations, it is true of governments which are the expression of organized society, the only organization that has the power to enforce its decrees, and the only one to which the people may look in carrying out their will for themselves and for their fellow men.

I wish for this organization the satisfaction and pride of eminent success, and I hope it will increase its activities and maintain its standing and its integrity, as it has until this hour, until this great humanitarian problem of rescuing human souls has been completely accomplished; and that out of it may grow, some day, perpetual peace and harmony among all the peoples of the world, and if we can make any contribution to this without regard to politics, religion, race, color, or national origin, those who become the beneficiaries of our activities will thank Almighty God that there were such men and women as those who are now contributing to this great result.

EXCHANGE OF AMBASSADORS WITH IRELAND

Mr. SALTONSTALL. Mr. President, last week I was glad to read that the State Department had seen fit to exchange Ambassadors with the State of Ireland, whereas previously we had been represented by a Minister. I have felt that this move should have been made before, and on April 13 last I wrote to the Secretary of State, as follows:

We have in this country a great many Americans of Irish descent and I believe that the time has come when serious consideration should be given to making the Legation in Ireland an Embassy and having this country represented not by a Minister, but by an Ambassador.

I wish to have printed immediately following my remarks an editorial entitled "Old Friends," from the Boston Pilot of Saturday, January 28, 1950.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

OLD FRIENDS

Much of the news that comes out of the State Department these days is of such a disquieting nature that it is refreshing to read that amid the pressure of all sorts of other problems we have seen fit to exchange Ambassadors with the young state of Ireland. While we have had it pointed out to us with almost monotonous regularity by Mr. Dean Acheson that this kind of recognition does not imply any sort of approval of the government so recognized (as in the proposals on Spain), we cannot help feeling that in this case at least the exchange of Ambassadors merely makes clear a sympathy of long standing. It is almost like an international handshake in an old friendship.

Ireland represents for us today not just one more member of the family of nations but a Christian and distinctly Catholic state in a world where the principles upon which it has been founded need vital reassertion. How in the spirit of the holy year was Ireland first among nations to grant a special amnesty to prisoners. In an age when political considerations are used as a basis for repressive measures against minorities how Ireland stands out as a land of freedom and tolerance. When other nations refuse to allow the mention of God in official documents and discourage religious observances Ireland proclaims His Sovereignty in the very opening words of her constitution. We do well surely to join hands with a people so fully conscious of the presence of God in the affairs of men.

The Pilot particularly rejoices in being able to take notice of an event which has been the object of the strivings of so many generations and the ideal of so many valiant hearts. The history of the struggles of Ireland toward independence are intimately associated with the history of this journal and some may well say that the Pilot itself may take some credit for the goal that has been attained. Whatever may be said on that point, the Pilot can say today that all nations will benefit by the spirit of Christian policy that the traditions of Ireland will make fresh in the exercise of international relations.

TRIBUTE TO BRIG. GEN. JULIUS KLEIN

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, I send to the desk a statement which I have prepared on the subject of one of the distinguished soldiers whose appointment we confirmed in the National Guard last Thursday.

I ask unanimous consent that this statement be printed at this point in the body of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

There being no objection, Mr. WILEY's statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Mr. President, on page 956 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD for January 26 is a list of many distinguished soldiers whose appointments the Senate confirmed to various units of our armed forces establishment. Among the able men so confirmed for appointment, as brigadier generals in our National Guard, was one whom I should like to devote a few moments on. Ordinarily I would not single out any single individual out of so large a roster of citizen-soldiers, but I do think the facts in this particular instance merit special attention.

Brig. Gen. Julius Klein, who was confirmed to that National Guard rank as of November 10, 1949, is not a constituent of mine, nor is he a resident of my State, rather he is a resident of our neighbor State of Illinois. I do, however, want to mention some of his fine qualifications because I think they exemplify the best in America's tradition of citizen-soldiers who have sprung to arms in the defense of their beloved Nation when the call of duty has come. We know that throughout our country men like him are giving of their time and energy to participate in National Guard units and in other elements of our vital reserve components.

General Klein has met the Nation's enemy in two wars. His conduct was equally brilliant in both. In the Second World War he distinguished himself both as a brilliant administrator and as a combat officer, commanding troops in several invasion battles. In commenting on Julius Klein's record, the former Secretary of War, Robert P. Patterson, said: "I cannot say too much for the caliber of his work. He is an officer of marked ability and notable vigor. I am sure he is thoroughly qualified for Federal recognition in his present rank and post."

Mr. President, I should like to give you an idea of Julius Klein's singular relationship with the rank and file in the Army. Serving as a full colonel in the Pacific, under the command of the great General MacArthur, General Klein always spoke of himself as "the GI with the eagle on the shoulder patch." He is still a GI. His attitude will never change, even though the shoulder patch has changed into one bearing a star.

When as the newly elected national commander of the Jewish War Veterans, he became the spokesman for 800,000 Jewish war veterans, Julius Klein promised to lead this great veterans' organization into further services of the principles of American democracy. Under his leadership, the Jewish War Veterans grew in stature and did indeed expand its usefulness far beyond even its fine effort in the past.

So, this citizen-soldier, a stanch patriot and anti-Communist leader, has been a credit to the Nation, a credit to the Army, and a credit to the Jewish faith to which he has been devoted throughout his entire life. He has been prominent in public life long before he joined the Army, which was prior to the Japanese sneak attack on Pearl Harbor. When the war came to an end, and his ability as a public-relations consultant was needed by the then Secretary of War, Robert P. Patterson, Julius Klein put aside his own personal interests and continued to serve the country in the capacity of special assistant to the Secretary of War.

I am, indeed, gratified, Mr. President, to see that Julius Klein's past service to his country and future usefulness are recognized by the Federal Recognition Board.

Good luck to him and to our great National Guard.

NATIONAL HEALTH INSURANCE

Mr. HUNT. Mr. President, will the Senator from Michigan yield 5 minutes to me, to permit me to make a brief statement, with the understanding that by doing so he will not lose his right to the floor?

The VICE PRESIDENT. That can be done only by unanimous consent.

Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the Senator from Wyoming may proceed, if the Senator from Michigan will yield for that purpose.

Mr. FERGUSON. I yield.

Mr. HUNT. I thank the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. President, the voluntary health insurance bill, introduced by me earlier today, is designed to provide a program of prepaid national health insurance with broad coverage to low-income groups of our people at a minimum premium. This bill carries no compulsory features and thus does not, in any sense of the word, socialize the health professions.

Health is, without question of a doubt, the most important aspect of our individual lives. Since the medical profession hold in their hands the health of the Nation and, through the health of the Nation, influence our ability to prosper, to pay taxes—yes, Mr. President, even to wage war—it is proper and necessary that jurisdiction over and direction of the health of the Nation rest with the profession. Therefore, the bill establishes a department of health, with Cabinet status. Surely the health of the people of the United States is as important as in other nations where health does have a cabinet post.

Since health is such a specialized service, it seems prudent to prescribe certain qualifications for the Secretary of the Department of Health, namely, that he shall be a professional health worker who has been active in the practice of medicine or dentistry, and who shall have had broad experience in the field of medical or dental education, and also, insofar as possible, in order to obviate the possibility of the health services being politically exploited, to provide further qualification that "the Secretary of Health shall have held no political office in any political party."

The bill provides that the Secretary of Health and the Under Secretary of Health, as well as five Assistant Secretaries of Health, shall be appointed by the President with the consent of the Senate.

The Assistant Secretaries of Health shall respectively head, first, the Bureau of Medical and Hospital Care; second, the Bureau of Public Health Practices; third, the Bureau of Children's Welfare; fourth, the Bureau of Research; fifth, the Bureau of Staff Services.

This bill closely follows the Hoover Commission's report on reorganization of the health services, the exceptions being in establishing Department of Health on a Cabinet level, and in excluding the Veterans' Bureau and armed services.

In order to accomplish a positive plan for prepaid health insurance for the low-income groups and to satisfy those leading the on-rushing campaign for compulsory health insurance, a national health insurance board is provided. This Board, as well as administering the national health-insurance program, is charged with the extension of medical and health services to rural shortage areas, and to farmer experimental health cooperatives by means of grants and loans. The Board is given wide latitude in determining the terms and conditions of personal health insurance, for the obvious reason that to include specifically the terms of health insurance in writing legislation is impossible, impracticable, and can be determined only by extensive actuarial studies and experience.

The National Health Insurance Board will be composed of five members, including the Surgeon General of the Public Health Service, to represent the medical profession, and four members appointed by the President, with the advice of the Senate, as follows: One shall represent hospital associations, one shall represent dental associations, and two shall represent the public at large. While not spelled out in the bill, they should, of course, be thoroughly trained in the field of health and accident insurance.

Since the primary objective of this bill is to make available prepaid health insurance to the low-income groups, families whose gross income is in excess of $5,000 are made ineligible. While not sufficient or adequate in all cases, prepaid health insurance is available to this group of families from private sources. Seventy-nine percent of the families would be eligible to purchase Government health insurance, since only 21 percent of our families have annual incomes above $5,000.

It is deemed unwise to provide health insurance with a deductible feature in an amount above $5, for the reason that any amount above $5 would, in all probability, preclude its purchase by the low-income group, and I am undecided whether even a $5 deductible feature should be provided for. However, some small deductible amount should be authorized, to discourage unnecessary visits to physicians and dental offices, using their time which should be available to those seriously in need of such services.

In presenting this bill to the Congress, I am quite aware that it does not do all things for all people. However, my observations in the Congress, as well as my mail pertaining to health insurance from all over the country, and hundreds of editorials from the Nation's press, firmly convince me that we cannot preserve the freedom of the practice of medicine and dentistry, that we cannot keep the professions uncontrolled and unregimented, and that we cannot maintain our American free and independent practices of these professions by simply denouncing compulsory health or state medicine—whichever one may wish to call it—by a continued stand-pat opposition.

Compulsory health insurance has been, in some form or other, before the Congress now for 11 years. The demand for changes in our methods of affording medical services is gaining momentum each succeeding year. In the United States today we have, without question of a doubt, the best physicians, dentists, nurses, and hospitals that the world has ever known in all history. To these professional health workers go the credit for increasing the life span of our people from 35 years, when this Nation was founded, to 67 years, as of today; 65 for men and 70 for women. This has been accomplished under our present form of medical practice. Surely no one questions the skill and professional attainments of the health services in the United States, but only wishes to make them available to those not now receiving such health services.

My views incorporated in this bill are the result of 16 years' active practice of one of the professions affected, 3 years in legislative, and 14 years' experience in the executive branch of Government. I think I know whereof I speak, and I have only one thought in mind in introducing this bill, namely, to make better health services available to all the people of this great Nation. It is clearly evident that the professions must come forward with an alternative to compulsory health insurance, or socialized medicine will ultimately follow, with lay direction and control.

Mr. President, I thank the Senator from Michigan for yielding to me.

INTEGRATED STEEL MILL FOR NEW ENGLAND—STATEMENT OF DR. ALFRED C. NEAL

Mr. TOBEY. Mr. President, on Friday Dr. Alfred C. Neal, vice president of the Federal Reserve Bank of Boston, appeared before the Joint Committee on the Economic Report and gave a lucid and well-reasoned appeal in behalf of securing an integrated steel mill for New England.

For the past 2 years, Gov. Sherman Adams, of New Hampshire, has devoted considerable time and energy toward the possibility of acquiring a steel plant for the very suitable area around Portsmouth, N. H. In that effort, he organized the New Hampshire steel project, headed by Eugene Whittemore, and composed of many other outstanding New Hampshire citizens. The New Hampshire congressional delegation has cooperated with Governor Adams and his steel committee in its efforts, and I believe that Dr. Neal's statement of last Friday bolsters their case with facts and figures. Therefore, I ask unanimous consent to incorporate as a part of my remarks the entire statement of Dr. Neal.

I might note, Mr. President, that certain of the exhibits offered by Dr. Neal in his testimony before the joint committee are not suitable for reproduction in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD since they are maps and graphic charts. However, I would ask the proper official to be sure to print such text and other material as is found to be applicable to these maps and charts.

Mr. President, I further ask unanimous consent to have incorporated into the RECORD at the conclusion of Dr. Neal's statement an editorial from the New Hampshire Sunday News of January 29 which relates to the same subject.

There being no objection, the statement and editorial were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATEMENT BY ALFRED C. NEAL, VICE PRESIDENT AND DIRECTOR OF RESEARCH, FEDERAL RESERVE BANK OF BOSTON, ON BEHALF OF THE NEW ENGLAND COUNCIL STEEL COMMITTEE

I am making this statement as a member of and economist for the steel committee of the New England Council. To save your time, I shall cover only the most important points in the statement itself. I shall introduce at appropriate points exhibits in support of the points that I make.

We propose to show:

1. That New England's steel-using industries—despite the fact that they accounted for almost three-quarters of the growth in manufacturing in New England since prewar—are seriously handicapped by the cost and supply of steel now available to them.

2. That New England, eastern New York State, New York City, and northern New Jersey would be relieved of the handicap of high-cost steel by the establishment of an integrated steel mill in New England.

3. That there is a close relationship between these two points and the recent increases in the price of steel.

The establishment of an integrated steel mill would make it possible for this area to participate more fully in the Nation's economic growth during the years to come and would further make it possible for this area to absorb a much larger volume of imports and so contribute more fully to meeting the requirements of our present international position.

To demonstrate that New England and the territory adjacent to it are currently handicapped by the cost of steel, and to demonstrate further that this cost handicap can be removed by the establishment of an integrated mill, it will be necessary to prove the following points:

1. That steel users in New England and the territory adjacent to it are presently under a cost handicap in their steel supply.

2. That there is sufficient market to justify the establishment of an integrated steel mill with a capacity of approximately one and one-quarter million tons of ingots. This is the size mill that we are advised would be necessary for efficiency for the type of products most needed by the market.

3. That the cost of making steel at such an integrated mill in New England and the profits that might be derived from such a mill would, on the basis of the estimates available, justify investment in it.

4. That conditions unrelated to the cost handicap of steel consumers, the market advantage of the New England and adjacent area, and the cost and profitability of the proposed mill have so far prevented the establishment of this mill in New England.

THE COST HANDICAP FOR NEW ENGLAND STEEL CONSUMERS

I shall now take up each of these points in turn, beginning with the present position of steel consumers in the New England area. It should be understood at the outset that New England and the area adjacent to it is an area of deficit steel supply. There is not in this area any integrated steel mill and there is very little nonintegrated steel production. The types of steel which bulk largest in the consumption of the area must be brought in from outside. The nearest mills are those at Sparrows Point, Md.; Buffalo, N. Y.; and Bethlehem, Pa. Since the mill at Bethlehem does not make products with which we are most concerned, for practical purposes we can concentrate upon the sources of supply at Sparrows Point, Buffalo, and points farther away.

Steel consumers in New England and the adjacent territory must buy their steel from these mills and pay freight from them to their own consuming points. These freight rates put New England consumers at a decided cost handicap. For example, it costs with today's freight rates $10.20 per ton to bring steel from Sparrows Point to New Haven, Conn.; $11.60 from Sparrows Point to Worcester, Mass.; and $12.60 from Sparrows Point to Manchester, N. H. Similarly it costs $12.20 per ton to bring steel from Buffalo, N. Y. to New Haven; $12.40 from Buffalo to Worcester; and $12.60 from Buffalo to Manchester. Since it is impossible for mills located at Sparrows Point and Buffalo to supply all of the steel that New Englanders consume, much of the steel moves in from the Pittsburgh district and the rate for freight alone from Pittsburgh to New Haven is $13.60 per ton; from Pittsburgh to Worcester, $15; and from Pittsburgh to Manchester, $15.20. I am submitting as exhibit A a table showing freight rates from the principal producing points which I have mentioned to a selected list of consuming points in New England.

What are the effects of cost handicaps of such size upon New England's steel-consuming industries? I am introducing as exhibit B a series of cases showing the reaction of typical New England steel consumers to this situation. Let me read you excerpts from these cases which are more fully described in the exhibit.

One employer of 1,500 stated recently that his board of directors is giving continuing consideration to abandoning their two existing plants in New England with a view to moving to Ohio.

Another employer of 8,000 workers said, "If a New England steel mill is built, our company will undoubtedly be able to continue in New England; if not, we will have to move much nearer the center of our Nation."

An employer of 750 stated that the present delivered cost of steel and iron is so high that in all probability within 2 years he would have to move the operations of one of his companies to the Middle West in order to keep the business healthy.

An official of another company employing over 6,000 workers said that any future expansion will be made in other parts of the country because their raw materials—iron and steel—cost so much in New England.

Another company employing 1,000 workers stated that if a steel mill is established in New England, the company would probably stay in business here, but if it is not, the company will either have to close up or move somewhere else. This company spends more than $1,000,000 a year on steel.

Another relatively small company estimates that a New England mill would mean a saving of about $1,000,000 annually to it.

It would be interesting and convincing to have these businessmen who are squeezed by high steel costs to tell their story to your committee. They will not do that, nor will most of them openly support the movement to obtain a New England mill because, as one told us recently, "We live by the grace of God and the Grace of Bethlehem Steel."

I believe that the freight costs that I have quoted, together with the reactions of typical New England steel consumers, demonstrate that this area suffers a severe cost handicap in steel at the present time for lack of an integrated steel mill to support its metalworking operations. It should be remembered that when we are discussing the metalworking operations in New England we are talking about businesses which employ 40 percent of the manufacturing wage earners in the region, or more than half a million people.

If we assume that an integrated steel mill were established in New England and that it sold its products at the same price as present suppliers now charge, how much would consumers in this area save? For purposes of the discussion, since we must consider freight rates from somewhere, let us assume that the mill is established at New London, Conn.

Mr. TOBEY. Mr. President, I wish to interpolate here to note that Dr. Neal made it clear that New London, Conn., is only used as an example. He stated that Portsmouth, N. H., has an unusually desirable site, and he has figures available to show comparable differentials for Portsmouth.

To use the same cities as we used before as examples, consumers in New Haven who now buy from Sparrows Point would save a minimum of $5.40 per ton; those who buy from Buffalo would save a minimum of $7.40 per ton, and those who buy from Pittsburgh would save $8.80 per ton. Consumers in Worcester who buy from Sparrows Point would save $5.80 per ton; those who buy from Buffalo would save $6.60 per ton, and those who buy from Pittsburgh would save $9.20 per ton. Consumers in Manchester who buy from Sparrows Point would save $4.60 per ton; those who buy from Buffalo would save $4.60 per ton; and those who buy from Pittsburgh would save $7.20 per ton. The savings would extend into New York City, Newark, and Jersey City. These consumers would save from 40 cents a ton on shipments from Sparrows Point up to $4.40 a ton on shipments from Pittsburgh. (The freight rates that I have used in these calculations appear in exhibit A.)

I have used for these calculations rail-freight rates. A check on trucking rates indicates that the savings on truck shipments for points close to the mill would be somewhat higher than those indicated. We have also checked water transportation rates and find that savings in line with those shown for rail shipment would result to the points mentioned which could be reached by water shipment.

I think I have presented enough evidence to show that New England steel consumers are presently under a substantial cost handicap because of their distance from integrated steel mills; that this cost handicap threatens the normal economic growth of the region, and that it can be removed if steel could be made as economically in New England as it is made at mills now supplying steel consumers in the area.

THE MARKET FOR A NEW ENGLAND STEEL MILL

When the members of the Steel Committee first approached steel companies on this project, they were told by almost all that New England probably did not have a market sufficiently large to support an integrated steel mill. Most of the companies approached offered to give us such assistance as they could to determine the size of the market that might be available to a New England mill, because the industry itself was not sure of its facts on this point. Doubt as to the size of the market set the first task for the committee.

The easiest method of determining how much steel of various types was consumed in the area that might be supplied by a New England mill was to ask the steel companies supplying this area to tell us how much they shipped into it. A questionnaire calling for this information in such detail that it would be reasonably useful to the steel industry was drawn up and submitted for study and comment to three of the major companies supplying the New England-New York-New Jersey market. Two of these suppliers refused flatly to give us the information which they said was necessary to determine whether a mill could be supported by the market, and the third gave us an equivocal answer which we interpreted to be a refusal. Fortunately, there have been published three studies which provide the basis for determining what the market for steel is in this New England-New York-New Jersey area.

The first of these, which covered only part of the products and part of the industry, was published by the Senate Small Business Committee; the second by Iron Age, a trade publication; and the third, which was issued only a few weeks ago, was made by the Bureau of the Census. There are considerable differences among these studies. The Iron Age study gives New England and the adjacent New York and northern New Jersey markets a total finished steel consumption in the metalworking industries of almost 6,000,000 tons. The more recent study by the Census Bureau, which covers carbon steel only, cuts this total down to about 3,500,000 tons. To use the most conservative basis possible for estimating the market, I shall use the recently publish Census Bureau figures to determine whether there is a market sufficiently large to justify an integrated steel mill, but with the qualification that the census figures understate the size of the market.

Obviously an integrated mill cannot make all products. We therefore confine ourselves to carbon steel products which might be made economically in a moderate-size mill having approximately 1,125,000 tons of ingot capacity and a comfortable operating rate of about 850,000 tons of finished steel. The local market in which a New England mill would have a freight advantage consists of the New England States, eastern New York State, New York City, and the Newark-Jersey City area. This market, in which a New England mill located at New London could deliver steel cheaper than any present competing mill, is shown on the map labeled "Exhibit C," which is based upon a study by the division of traffic research of the New Haven Railroad.

The biggest item consumed by the metalworking industries in this market consists of flat-rolled products. According to the Census Bureau figures, nearly 1,100,000 tons of sheet and strip were consumed by the metalworking industries in this market in 1947. In addition, there were consumed in this market more than 300,000 tons of plates. This gives us a total of flat-rolled products of more than 1,400,000 tons or one and seven-tenths times the comfortable operating rate of a flat-rolled products mill in the territory in which the New England mill would enjoy a positive freight advantage over any competitor.

In addition to the local market, there is a market for flat-rolled products in Florida, Texas, and the Pacific coast which could be economically reached by back hauls of ships now delivering lumber, sulfur, fertilizer, cotton, and other products to New England. This coastal market in which a New England mill could compete uses 663,000 tons of sheet and strip and 472,000 tons of plate in its metalworking industries alone. There is available further an estimated market of 100,000 tons of silicon sheet and strip which might be made by the New England mill, and a total export market of 662,000 tons in countries bordering on the Atlantic Basin.

If there is any fear that even this tremendous market of over 3,250,000 tons of flat-rolled steel in the metalworking industries alone could not support a New England mill, it is worth indicating that one or more bar mills could be added to supply carbon steel bars to a market which totals 481,000 tons in New England and the adjacent New York-New Jersey territory and close to 800,000 tons if Florida, Texas, and the Pacific coast were added. A detailed description of these markets is presented in exhibit D.

It is worthy of note in connection with the market, first, that these figures represent considerable underestimate because customers buying less than 50 tons per annum are not included, as well as for the reasons stated on the first page of exhibit D, and second, that the New England part of this market is not only growing at faster than the national rate, but that the establishment of a new integrated steel mill, with consequent savings to consumers, could be expected to accelerate that growth rate. On the basis of the acceleration of the growth of the metalworking industries which occurred in the 1930's in the area served by the Sparrows Point mill, which was greatly expanded at the beginning of that period, it is possible to estimate that the New England market alone would grow by approximately 450,000 tons per year between now and 1960—that is, in the next 10 years. (See chart 3 of exhibit D.)

Further evidence of the size of this local market for a New England mill can be gained from exhibit E which shows the heavy concentration of the metalworking industry in New England, New York, and New Jersey. This area, which accounts for nearly 20 percent of the Nation's population and nearly one-quarter of its income, produces substantially more than these proportions of many metal products. For example, it accounts for 97 percent of those employed making typewriters, 88 percent of those in cutlery, 71 percent in textile machinery, 65 percent in nails and spikes, 57 percent in wiring devices and supplies, 51 percent in ball and roller bearings, 44 percent in wire drawing, 41 percent in radios and related products, 40 percent of the machine tools, 39 percent in blowers and fans, 37 percent in general industrial machinery, 36 percent in special industrial machinery, and 34 percent in ship and boat building.

It is to be noted that this area does not have nearly the proportion of the automobile industry that its income and population would lead us to expect. It accounts for only 9 percent of the motor vehicle body and parts industry. It is also well short of its proportion of the heating and cooking appliance, boiler, and other industries using flat-rolled steel.

I submit that the establishment of an integrated steel mill in New England will result in a sizable expansion in some of these metalworking industries and that the growth potential in steel consumption of 450,000 tons per year within 10 years which I have referred to is not unrealistic.

It may be argued by some that the figures on total tonnage of steel consumed in this market disguise the great diversity of the market in the New England and adjacent territory. Careful explorations indicate that the diversity of this market is ably served by speciality steel mills and warehouses which buy the products of integrated mills and either further process and finish them or break them down into the small orders which the thousands of customers in the area require. In other words, a major market for an integrated New England mill would consist of the larger size orders placed by large consumers, speciality mills, and warehouses serving customers in the market area.

I believe that it is safe to conclude that there is sufficient market to justify the establishment of an integrated steel mill in New England, and that this market is of such a nature and has such a potential for growth that a New England mill of 1,250,000 tons of integrated capacity might find it desirable to expand after it had been in operation for a few years.

COSTS FOR A NEW ENGLAND MILL

Most of the members of the steel committee orginally were of the opinion that steel could not be made in an integrated steel mill in New England at competitive costs. At first sight the prospect for such a mill appeared discouraging. New England has neither iron ore nor coal or sufficient quality and in sufficient quantity to support an integrated mill. It is axiomatic that for an economic location for a steel mill it is necessary to satisfy two out of three requirements: coal, iron ore, and markets. Careful study by John E. Kelly, the committee's consultant, however, indicates that the physical location of iron ore and coal is less important than its economic location.

When he studied the possibilities of ocean transportation in large vessels of both iron ore and coal he found that we could obtain iron ore from Seven Islands, Quebec, the shipping point for Labrador ore, at an ocean transportation cost of slightly under $1 per gross ton, and that coal could be brought from Norfolk, the shipping point for southern West Virginia coal, for slightly over $1 per ton. In effect both coal and iron ore are economically closer to New England than they would be if there were deposits located within its territory only a few hundred miles apart. Further evidence of the economy of steel making on the coast is provided for the profitable operation of integrated mills both to the north at Sydney, Nova Scotia, and to the south at Sparrows Point, Md.

Some of the best coking coal in the country can be landed in New England in the types, qualities, and quantities used by an integrated mill at a delivered cost of no more than $10 per net ton. We find further that it is likely that we can obtain Labrador ore delivered in New England at $5.70 per gross ton, and that until the Labrador ore is available we can obtain Newfoundland ore currently being used to make steel in Nova Scotia and England at a landed cost of not over $6 per gross ton. Other sources of ore are also available at comparable costs. We believe that these delivered costs of raw materials would compare very favorably with those at Bethlehem Steel's Sparrows Point plant and would probably be somewhat lower than the costs at Pittsburgh. Admittedly our coal is a little more expensive, but Labrador ore would be cheaper and of a higher grade.

A third important raw material is scrap. Scrap is used for about 50 percent of the metal made in open-hearth furnaces, and about half of this 50 percent is purchased. In scrap, New England would have a decided advantage. New England is a surplus scrap-producing area. (See exhibit F.) In years of high activity like 1947 and 1948 it had a net shipment of scrap out of the territory of more than three-quarters of a million tons. An integrated steel mill of the size contemplated would take only about one-third of this excess supply of scrap and therefore New England would continue to be a surplus scrap-producing area. The present price structure for scrap would not be materially altered by the establishment of an integrated mill, and on the present price structure for scrap there would be a saving to a New England mill of about $7 a ton as compared with a Sparrows Point mill, of about $9 a ton as compared with a Buffalo mill, and of about $10 a ton as compared with a Pittsburgh mill. The reason for these savings is that the price of scrap in New England is worked back from the nearest buying mills to New England by deducting the freight costs to ship from New England to the nearest integrated steel mills.

There is an ample supply of limestone available in New England and in nearby New Brunswick, Canada, which could be delivered at the mill at costs in line with current costs at other producing centers. We estimate a delivered cost of $2 per ton.

We have made the most careful cost estimates possible using prices of raw materials mentioned earlier and conversion costs presently being realized by the most efficient units of the steel industry, units which we could duplicate and improve on in New England. Using Labrador ore and the other raw materials just described we estimate a cost of pig iron of under $24 per ton.

In a flat-rolled products mill making plates and hot and cold rolled sheet in a combination that would be supported by the market, we would have average costs of finished steel using Labrador ore at about $57 per ton. At today's prices we estimate conservatively that we would obtain an average selling price, or realization per ton, of approximately $90 on the combination of products which could be made and sold by a New England mill.

I am introducing in exhibit G the build-up of manufacturing costs and gross sales used in the pro forma profit and loss statements which I shall discuss later.

THE FINANCING PLAN

Before I discuss the profitability of the mill I should like to outline a financing plan which has been suggested for it. When various members of our committee first discussed this project with leading steel companies they were told that the principal difficulty in building a mill today would be the high construction costs and the difficulty of raising the money to build a mill at today's construction costs. We knew from the outset that an integrated mill built today would cost probably twice as much, or more than twice as much, as existing mills. From a bookkeeping point of view such high construction costs would impose a heavy burden upon the mill for depreciation, interest, and return on stockholders' capital.

To meet this problem a novel financing plan has been suggested. I mention it here and I use it in the calculations of the profitability of the mill not necessarily because the steel committee advocates it, but as an indication of how far New England might be willing to go in cooperation with an established steel company to assist that company to set up an integrated mill in New England. This financing plan has been endorsed by four of New England's governors in principle, but whether it could be established in practice would depend upon whether suitable arrangements could be made between a steel company and one of the States in New England. Our committee has offered its assistance to any company wishing to enter into such negotiations.

The financing plan involves the use of a State authority similar to authorities now in operation in various parts of the country in the field of housing, ports, airports, and turnpikes. A large part of the financing—in our example we have used two-thirds—would be done by a State steel authority. The steel authority would for all practical purposes own the steel mill built to the specifications of the steel company and would lease the mill to a New England steel corporation. The New England steel corporation would obligate itself to pay a rental to the steel authority which would cover interest and amortization. The New England steel corporation on its part would put up approximately one-third of the cost, an amount which would supply working capital and certain equipment and so would have a substantial investment in the project on its own account. In our example we have assumed that the steel corporation would have an investment of $80,000,000 out of a total capital investment of $240,000,000.

I should like to repeat again that this example merely works out in terms of figures a proposal which has been widely discussed and does not purport to represent what might actually be used because that is a matter that can be determined only by negotiations between the steel company interested in building a New England mill and the State interested in setting up a steel authority. The plan is analogous to the sale and lease-back arrangement now widely employed by life-insurance companies, with the difference that a State steel authority stands in the place of the life-insurance company.

PROFITABILITY OF AN INTEGRATED NEW ENGLAND STEEL MILL

The estimates of profits of a New England steel mill are based upon the following assumptions:

1. That the mill could be built for $240,000,000, including working capital;

2. That $160,000,000 of this total would represent investment by a State steel authority which could raise this sum by borrowing at an average rate of 1¾ percent;

3. That $80,000,000 represents an equity investment in a New England mill, one-half of which would be supplied by an established steel company and one-half by the public;

4. That the New England steel corporation would pay a rental on the plant owned by the State steel authority which would cover interest at 1¾ percent and which would amortize the authority's investment over a period of 25 years, amortization being at a rate which varies with operations. (See exhibit H.)

For the purpose of measuring the performance of this mill we have set up pro forma profit and loss statements for 10 years which cover operations from 70 percent of ingot capacity to 100 percent of ingot capacity, and which average 82 percent over the 10-year period. (See exhibit I.) This average operating rate is slightly better than the industry average over the last 36 years and is, we feel, justified by the fact that a flat-rolled products mill is not subject to such wide fluctuations in operation as the average mill in the industry, and by the further fact that mills in deficit steel producing areas show a better operating rate than the average. This judgment has been confirmed by operating steel company executives.

On the basis of these assumptions, using today's costs and prices, the mill would be profitable. Using the 10-year average figures, on the basis of gross sales of slightly more than $69,000,000 per year, the mill would have a manufacturing profit of $25,354,000, would take as much for general administrative and selling expenses as comparable mills, would pay a rental which covers interest and amortization on the authority's investment, would charge as much depreciation as comparable mills now charge, would pay its property taxes and its Federal and State income taxes, and would average over the 10-year period a net profit after taxes of $6,260,000 per year.

Over the 10 years of operations, this profit would provide an average return of 7.8 percent on its stockholders' investment and 9.1 percent on sales. It should be noted that because of the rapid amortization, the return on stockholders' investment improves with the passage of time under the conditions assumed. None of these figures includes a profit of approximately $500,000 per year which could be realized from the sale of by-products.

Twenty-five years is a conservative period for amortizing such a new mill. Obviously, the mill would be more profitable with a longer amortization period. For example, if 50 years were used instead of 25 and interest averaged 2 percent (because longer-term securities would be used), other conditions being the same, the average return on stockholders' investment would be 9.9 percent and that on sales would be 11.4 percent. Whether a longer period than 25 years might be used would depend upon the extent to which the State desiring the mill wished to depart from conventional financial practices to serve the purpose of stimulating employment and income, reducing its relief and social service cost, or other public purposes.

It would appear from these calculations, using the somewhat novel financing plan that has been suggested, that a New England mill could be operated profitably. We believe that the suggested financing plan answers the argument earlier advanced by representatives of the industry that it would be almost impossible to obtain the money to build the mill, or if the money were obtained that the mill could not be profitable at today's construction costs.

WHY HASN'T THE STEEL INDUSTRY BUILT A NEW ENGLAND MILL?

It may reasonably be asked, if the mill would be as profitable as we have estimated it to be, Why hasn't some steel company come forward and entered into negotiations to finance and build the mill along the lines that have been suggested? We have talked to a number of steel companies about this possibility. We have as yet not covered in our conversations all the companies that might be interested in the mill. Such conversations as we have had have been conducted in a businesslike way, in confidence and without publicity. I would be violating our own pledge of confidence if I were to disclose the names of the companies that we have talked with and the individual reactions that they have had to our proposal. In view of the fact that we are currently carrying on conversations with some companies and intend to carry on conversations with others, I should not like to jeopardize our excellent chances of obtaining this mill by disclosing confidential information. However, I do think it is both safe and proper to make certain generalizations regarding the reactions of the companies with whom we have talked.

Our conversions have been guided by the principle that any company that might be interested in a New England mill should be willing to put up a substantial investment. We have suggested that an established steel company should put up $40,000,000 to $50,000,000 of its own money. Obviously there are not many steel companies in the country that have $40,000,000 or $50,000,000 in cash or could raise that much in today's capital market.

The reactions of the companies that we have talked to follow a similar pattern. These companies have for many years been planning their modernization and expansion programs. Most appear to have them well under way or nearing completion. It should be realized that discovery of the Labrador ore is a new development. It became generally known only in the summer of 1948. It represented a factor which, I believe, had not been taken into account in the modernization and expansion programs of most companies in the industry.

Evidence that we have indicates that the steel industry has a certain amount of difficulty in raising the money required for carrying out its own long-planned modernization and expansion programs. Consider the alternatives faced by the companies with whom we have talked. They are already committed to heavy programs of capital investment to improve the competitive position of their existing mills. In some cases we found that the companies were hard pressed to raise enough money to complete their existing modernization and expansion programs. The expenditure of $50,000,000 to complete their own program might save a stockholders' investment of $300,000,000 to $600,000,000 when competition becomes tough again. If they were to divert $50,000,000 to a New England mill, regardless of its profitability, they might be sacrificing or endangering the interest of their stockholders in their existing properties.

We are convinced, gentlemen, that it is not the lack of profitability of a New England mill which has deterred the companies with whom we have talked from bringing a mill into this area. One major stumbling block has been the lack of free capital to take advantage of the opportunity.

In addition to this obstacle, however, there is considerable evidence of another stumbling block. The companies that we have talked to have generally been fairly large. Each has had to consider in its calculation whether in establishing a New England mill it would not be competing with its other operations. The competition would be both direct and indirect. First, to the extent that they were now selling steel in New England and the adjacent market from other mills of their own company, they would be cutting their own mills out of the market. More important than that, however, has been the consideration of indirect competition. They have been selling to large customers located in the territory adjacent to their present mills. They realize that the establishment of an integrated steel mill in New England to serve one of the richest market areas in the country, accounting as it does for nearly one-quarter of the Nation's income, would offer a strong magnet to some of their customers to establish fabricating facilities in the territory adjacent to the New England mill, or to expand fabricating facilities already located there. They would therefore face the possibility of losing sales to customers in the territory of their present mills by establishing a New England mill. That possibility, looked at from our side, is part of our opportunity.

I believe that these have been the major considerations involved in the decisions made by some of the companies to whom we have talked not to participate in the New England venture. I state these conclusions not in criticism, but simply as my own best understanding of the facts. I state them the more readily because prospects of success in our search are still very good.

THE CONSUMERS' STAKE IN MILL LOCATION

The major reason why steel companies do not have the capital available both to modernize their own facilities and to enter into ventures like the New England steel mill is that they have made inadequate provision for depreciation through no fault of their own. The other side of the argument, which I mentioned earlier, that steel companies had made to us to the effect that construction costs were too high today to justify a new mill, is the fact that existing plants in the steel industry in most cases are carried on the books at preinflation costs and are depreciated on the basis of these original costs. Conditions not of the industry's making or of our making have raised enormously the cost of building or replacing steel-mill facilities. The industry has been and is currently modernizing—and that is another word for replacing—its facilities. It has not obtained enough from its depreciation allowances to carry out its modernization (replacement) program. It is therefore forced, I believe, to charge consumers in the price of steel an amount sufficient to permit it to raise the funds necessary to carry out a considerable part of this modernization (replacement) program.

Now, from an economic point of view, provision should have been made in the past for funds with which to replace or modernize facilities. The consumers of the past should have financed today's modernization program. Instead, the consumers of today and of the future must finance these modernization programs. Solely upon my own responsibility, I should like to raise this question. If consumers, through circumstances not of their own making and in fact through circumstances largely beyond the control of all of us, are in effect financing a very large part of the steel industry's modernization and expansion program, should not the consumers of steel have a considerable voice in where the money for that modernization and expansion program is spent? Spending money derived from retained earnings—which in turn were derived from the prices at which steel is sold—for the purpose primarily of protecting past investments in what may be uneconomic locations, can hardly be considered to be rewarding to the consumer who puts up the money in the form of the higher prices that he pays for steel. If steel consumers in our territory were paying higher prices for steel today and could foresee in the future the establishment of a mill in their territory which would save them in freight the amounts that I indicated earlier—$5 to $9 a ton and more—then I think that they would feel that the sacrifice that they were making by paying the higher prices for steel would be rewarded later. They could see cheaper steel in the future in return for more expensive steel today. But as matters now stand and as they will remain until a New England mill is established, they simply see higher prices for steel today and the prospect that in the future they will either have to move or go out of business. Consumers have no voice in the decisions as to where these sums will be spent which are being raised by virtue of higher prices. It is for that reason that I welcome this opportunity to present to this committee this statement of the facts as we see them. If our opportunity to participate in the economic growth of the Nation in which this committee is interested is jeopardized by decisions with respect to steel prices and steel plant location, then I think that our situation becomes a matter of public concern.

I should like to conclude with a few words about this movement for a New England steel mill. In some quarters our effort has been characterized as a political campaign to obtain something that was economically unjustified. I should like to introduce two exhibits which I think will prove the contrary. One, exhibit J, is a list of the names of the members of the New England council's steel committee. The men on this committee, like all New England council members, are doing what they believe to be a public service for the region in which they live and have their businesses. They can hardly be called promoters because so far as I know none of them is expecting to make a promoter's profit out of the establishment of a New England mill. They are not paid for their work on this committee. They certainly cannot be called politicians because all but one hold no political office and the one who does was elected to a political office after he became interested in this project, and he was elected, by the way, on the Republican ticket. The second exhibit (exhibit K) is a chronology of the development of the New England steel project. It began in 1946. None of the money that has been spent on it so far consists of public funds. It is a privately financed undertaking. In view of the importance of this project to the future growth and prosperity of our region, it should not be at all surprising to find that holders of political office in and from New England support the movement, and I am glad that they do.

Let me finish by making a small observation about New England's present economic position. Our region over the years has made great contributions of men, talent, capital, and taxes to develop other areas of the country. We have even contributed whole factories to the less industrialized parts of the country. We have not made all these contributions happily, but we have made them. In seeking an integrated steel mill we are not seeking to take anything away from any other region but only to take advantage of a new opportunity available to us, an opportunity which may help us to lay a firm foundation for our further economic development. If we are to have an expanding economy in this country, each region must take advantage of the opportunities available to it. We are trying to do that in New England. If we are to have satisfactory international economic relations, each region and each area of the country must take advantage of those opportunities available to it to use profitably and efficiently those goods which it can obtain more cheaply abroad than it can obtain at home. In seeking an integrated steel mill, therefore, the New England Council's Steel Committee is trying to do its bit to insure an expanding and prosperous economy in the Nation and to improve our international economic relations. Its motives, gentlemen, are not parochial and selfish. Its purposes, as I understand them, are the same as those of your committee.

I appreciate your time and attention.

TYPICAL EXAMPLES OF HARDSHIP DUE TO THE PRESENT NEW ENGLAND STEEL SUPPLY SITUATION

(Confidential memorandum prepared by Charles Kellogg, New England Council)

(Listed below, without company names or other identifying information, are typical cases reflecting the disadvantageous position in which existing New England plants find themselves with reference to the cost and delivery factors of their chief raw material, steel.)

1. The president of a drop-forging company, employing 1,500, whose products are sold throughout an area extending at least as far west as Chicago, stated recently that his board of directors is giving continuing consideration to abandoning their two existing plants in New England with a view to moving to Ohio. This man stated that since the abandonment of the basing-point pricing system, his company has paid $487,000 for inward transportation of hot-rolled carbon bars, and outward transportation of completed forgings and finished machined products. A large part of his market is in the Detroit area. He further stated that delivery schedules of raw materials, almost entirely steel, were unsatisfactory and made production control difficult. On top of the above figure of $487,000, this company's president had determined that another $300,000 additional cost resulted largely from their present location, with respect to distance from their markets.

In discussing the possible establishment of a New England steel mill, he stated that such an achievement would constitute an event of the greatest importance to his company, and that he was wholly in favor of the New England steel mill. He has expressed his company's interest by a substantial contribution to the financing of the council's endeavors.

2. The manager of the New England division of a large national concern, with several plants, employing over 8,000 workers, expressed great enthusiasm for the development of steel-production facilities in New England. He put it this way: "Now, we're at the end of the line; we have to ship all our raw materials in, manufacture it, and then ship the products back. If a New England steel mill is built, our company will undoubtedly be able to continue in New England. If not, we will have to move much nearer the center of our Nation. I don't favor such a move, and yet our costs are so high here that we might have to abandon all our New England plants."

3. The president and principal owner of a screw machine products company making screws, nuts, bolts, and rivets, and employing 650 people, said that he figures it costs him $105,000 more to conduct his present business where it is now located than if he conducted the identical business in Indiana. He stated that he has made comprehensive studies of what would be required to move his machinery and equipment out of New England, and that, together with the cost of building a new plant, the total cost would be so high that, from a dollar-and-cents point of view, it would be better to liquidate his business completely.

4. The president and general manager of a company making metal stampings and automobile accessories and employing 800 people directly, is also president of another company whose products are iron castings, electric steel castings, and carbon alloy castings, capitalized at more than $1,000,000 and employs 750 people. He states that the present delivered cost of steel and iron is so high as to seriously endanger a profitable operation. Some months ago this man said that in all probability within 2 years he would have to move the operations of the first-mentioned company to the Middle West in order to keep the business healthy.

5. The president of a company employing 3,500 workers whose products include a wide range of electrical and nonelectrical household appliances, thermos bottles, cutlery products and others, stated that his concern annually consumes in excess of 10,000 tons of sheet and strip steel, steel castings, and iron. While giving no specific estimate of the additional cost of conducting their present business in New England, this man expressed serious interest in and support of the New England Council's drive to bring about the establishment of a local steel mill. He said that the local availability of iron and steel would mean a great deal to his concern because of considerably lower inward transportation charges.

6. The treasurer of a machinery manufacturing concern with 6 plants in 5 of the New England States, capitalized at more than $30,000,000, and employing 6,125 workers, stated that although the company intends to stay in New England, he feels that any future expansion will be made in other parts of the country because their raw materials—iron and steel—cost so much in New England. As an example of this company's thinking, the treasurer, who happens in this case to be the top executive, stated that they had at one time seriously considered the purchase of an existing blast furnace in eastern Massachusetts in order to try to reduce their raw-material cost. Like the companies mentioned above, this concern has contributed financially to the special steel fund of the council.

7. The plant manager of one unit of an international concern, making a wide range of heavy industrial equipment and tools, stated that he was very much in favor of the establishment of an integrated steel plant anywhere in New England as it would undoubtedly benefit their New England plant.

From other sources, the writer has been told that this plant's location is at present probably uneconomic because of its distance from both its raw material supply and the other plants of the same company for which it makes component parts. This plant is one of northern New England's largest iron and steel consuming units. It employs 1,000 workers, in a community with only 6 other small manufacturing industries, and having a total population of about 15,000.

8. Although not directly comparable, the following case may be pertinent. The eastern division of a national steel company has three fabricating plants in New England and employs more than 4,000 people. These plants make a wide variety of parts as follows: steel rods and wire, high and low carbon rods, wire screening, poultry netting, perforated metals, card clothing, industrial wire cloth, nails and brads, springs, link fence, wire rope, electric welded fabrics, and heavy hardware. The New England manager for this company stated that for extremely adverse labor conditions in his company's plants elsewhere and because conversely the economic climate in New England was so much more favorable, the company was considering abandonment or sale of its other properties, and substantial expansion of its New England operations.

In discussing the integrated steel mill proposal with this representative of the New England council, their man stated that if a steel mill were built in New England it would in all probability help this company substantially to expand in New England.

9. The vice president of a metal stamping company employing 400 advises that it uses from 2,500 to 5,000 tons of steel per year, and that on this they are paying $10 per ton more in freight alone than they would have to pay if there were a mill in New England within 100 miles. This means an extra cost to them of $25,000 to $50,000 per year.

If they could save a difference like this they say that they could get more orders, offer additional jobs, and show great savings to their customers.

10. A textile machinery company employing 2,500 and using about 2,500 tons of steel annually states that it is paying close to $10 per ton more for steel than it would have to pay if there were an integrated mill in New England.

11. A hardware concern employing 1,000 says that if a steel mill comes to New England, it will stay in business. Otherwise, this company will close or move. It buys over a million dollars' worth of steel per year now and can hardly break even. It expects to expand if a steel mill is established in New England.

12. A chain manufacturing company employing 750 uses about 50,000 tons of steel per year. It estimates its present freight disadvantage on steel at $10 per ton.

MARKET FOR A NEW ENGLAND STEEL MILL

More than 3,400,000 tons of carbon-steel sheets, strip, plates, and bars, and silicon-steel sheets and strip were consumed in 1947 by the metalworking industries in the market areas of the United States most readily accessible from a deep-water New England steel mill. (See attached table I.) The total of 3,400,000 tons does not include exports or use in construction, mining, farms, public utilities, railroads, governmental units, and other nonmanufacturing uses.

Almost 3,000,000 tons of that total were in bars and in those flat-rolled products which could be made by a New England mill whose plate-making facilities were limited to sizes and gages which could be produced by a sheet mill.

Other prospective markets for the products of a New England steel mill would increase the total:

1. Direct sales to customers in the nonmetalworking industries, such as railroads, utilities, mines, farms, construction, governmental units, and the oil industry. (Consumption of this type is not included in our figures.)

2. Sales to specialty steel mills in the market area for finishing and delivery to customers outside the market area.

3. Domestic markets in which a New England mill would not have a natural advantage, but where salesmanship and customer relationships would produce sales.

4. Export sales to eastern Canada and maritime provinces, to Central and South American, to Africa, and to other areas. (See tables II and III.)

5. Growth of the metalworking industries in New England and the other natural market areas, as a result of—

(a) Normal growth of the sort which has taken place in New England during the past 20 years.

(b) The extra growth which would result from the more rapid expansion of existing metalworking plants and the more rapid establishment of new plants after enlargement of the area's steel-making capacity. (See charts II and III.)

Since the New England area would still be a net importer of steel, the operating rate of a New England mill would tend to be higher and somewhat more stable than that of a steel-exporting area. (See chart IV for the operating records of other areas during periods of depression or recession.)

[1] From 1930 to 1938 the steel-making capacity of Bethlehem's Sparrows Point mill was increased by 1,360,000 tons. The Sparrows Point proportion of total United States capacity increased from 2.7 percent to 4.1 percent. Between 1920 and 1930 the capacity at Sparrows Point had increased from 2.1 percent to 2.7 percent of United States capacity. (Source: American Iron and Steel Institute.)

[2] Slightly different groups of industries have been used in the two comparisons because of changes in census classifications and incomplete data. The differences do not affect the general pattern of the data.

(Chart III omitted.)

The trend of ferrous metal receipts in New England during the last 20 years has been to increase at a rate of about 1.5 percent a year. The upward trend in the United States as a whole has been at a rate of about 1 percent a year. New England's proportion of metal receipts has grown.

A continuation of the past trend of normal growth would produce an average annual increase of approximately 14,000 tons in the New England consumption of the products mentioned above. By 1960 the consumption trend for these items would have increased by 182,000 tons.

The increased capacity of the Sparrows Point mill of the Bethlehem Steel Co. during the 1930's contributed to a greater growth of the metalworking industries in the Baltimore and Philadelphia industrial areas than in the country as a whole (chart II). The growth trend for steel consumption in these areas from 1929 to 1939 was apparently about 4 percent a year—3 percent above the national average.

The establishment of a steel mill in New England would stimulate extra growth of the metalworking industries in the region through both extra expansion by existing firms and the more rapid establishment of new firms. If the extra increase were 3 percent a year, which is the maximum that could reasonably be expected, the consumption trend for the specified items would increase by 42,000 tons a year. By 1960 the trend would have increased by 546,000 tons.

The lines plotted above show the maximum and minimum growth trends for the New England metalworking market for these products. The most probable trend which would accompany a new mill would lie somewhere between the maximum and minimum lines.

Actual consumption would fluctuate above and below the trend as industrial activity varied over the business cycle, just as it has in the past.

A STEEL MILL FOR NEW ENGLAND—HIGHLIGHTS OF THE NEW ENGLAND COUNCIL'S ACTIVITIES

1. November 1946: President Richard L. Bowditch proposes to executive committee of the New England Council an economic research program to determine if a New England steel plant would be warranted. Preliminary work begun.

2. March 1947: Mr. Bowditch first publicly urges New England as the logical location of a steel plant to be supplied from overseas mines.

3. September 1947: The New England Council retains Econometric Institute, Inc., to study the possibilities of establishing an integrated steel plant in New England.

4. June 1948: The Econometric Institute, Inc., reports to the council that New England has the markets, the labor, and the metal scrap to justify expansion of its existing nonintegrated steel production, and that new developments should be carefully studied.

5. June 1948: Thirty-five officers and directors of the council journey to Canada to discuss matters of mutual economic interest with governmental and business leaders of Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, Prince Edward Island, and Newfoundland.

6. July 1948: The Federal Reserve Bank of Boston and New England Council join in a study of the impact of the basing-point decision on important New England industries.

7. August 1948: The council and bank receive from Mr. John E. Kelly, mining consultant, a detailed report of the status of the recently discovered iron-ore deposits in Labrador and Quebec, and current progress in their development.

8. December 1948: The council appoints a New England iron and steel supply committee to study carefully all elements and available facts bearing on this subject. First meeting held.

9. January 1949: Steel committee members begin exploratory conversations with top executives of major American steel companies.

10. January 1949: Mr. Kelly renders completely documented Canadian ore survey to the Federal Reserve Bank of Boston.

11. April 1949: Continued contacts with steel executives.

12. June 1949: With new information available, the steel committee, under Chairman Frederick S. Blackall, Jr., retains Mr. Kelly's professional engineering services.

13. July 1949: Mr. Kelly receives cordial cooperation from Canadian mining interests and visits Ungava ore deposits in Labrador and Quebec; also Newfoundland iron mines.

14. August 1949: Under leadership of Chairman Blackall, Mr. Kelly and Dr. Neal of Federal Reserve bank begin direct negotiations with chief executives of several major basic steel companies.

15. October 1949: Several coastal communities in New England organize study groups to prepare local site and resource data.

16. January 1950: Dr. A. C. Neal, research economist on steel committee, testifies before joint congressional committee on the economic report, concerning the economic feasibility for manufacture of steel in New England, and the region's need for a local source of steel.

[From the New Hampshire Sunday News, Manchester, N. H., January 29, 1950]

WE HAVE NO FRIENDS

New England has no friends.

The rest of the country regards this section as an economic and cultural backwater, inhabited by a race of coupon clippers living off the proceeds of wealth inherited from New Bedford whalers.

The Federal Government thinks of us as a hotbed of reactionary Republicans, entrenched State Street financiers and wrongheaded Yankee dirt farmers living off the sweat of a great mass of exploited immigrant mill workers.

The Government's idea of how to treat New England is to establish discriminatory freight rates in behalf of the South and West, bring lawsuits against some of our most prosperous and stable industries (i. e., United Shoe and Scott-Williams) entice away others through Federal subsidies lavished on Puerto Rico and the TVA region, and keep up a series of harassing maneuvers against our power companies. Meanwhile, New England, which continues thrifty and prosperous despite its enemies, is a principal source of the very tax moneys which the Government hands out to the shiftless and the indigent in other parts of the country.

Insult is heaped on injury by trust company panjandrums who make their headquarters in New England and operate on New England wealth, but who rarely, if ever, invest any of their New England money in New England enterprise.

Like the Federal Government which they so bitterly criticize, the moguls of State Street prefer Puerto Rico to Maine as an outlet for swollen treasures in their bursting coffers.

Now comes United States Steel, and others of the combine known as Big Steel, to interpose the ponderous weight of their technological and financial opinion between New England and its legitimate aspirations for a share in the steel industry.

Pittsburgh, it appears, is threatened. Pittsburgh is the great bastion and redoubt of those carefully contrived processes whereby Big Steel piles up unprecedented postwar profits while blandly arguing that it is necessary to raise prices still higher.

Pittsburgh makes more than a third of the country's steel, but as the Boston Herald observes, "much of its market is miles of high freight rates away." Notes the Herald:

"Even if the basing-point system should be restored, a large chunk of the steel-production capacity down there is an economic anachronism. Whenever there is a slackening on steel demand, it is the Pittsburgh plants that slip off most in production, while the outlying plants, in Chicago, Sparrows Point, and Birmingham, maintain a better record.

"They know down there that steel decentralization is in the cards, that Pittsburgh cannot forever exist as a surplus production area. They know that a big steel plant in New England will take away a rich market. They want to continue to ship to Indiana steel to be fashioned into refrigerator cases to be shipped to Springfield, Mass., to be made into refrigerators. They want to continue to supply the steel for subassemblies to be freighted later to New England automobile assembly plants in a transportation maze of production. It is Pittsburgh steel against New England. So the fight is on."

And so the spokesmen of Big Steel inform Congress that a steel mill in New England—where the conversion from soft goods to hard goods has doubled the region's share of national steel consumption—would be uneconomic. Admiral Ben Moreell, of Jones & Laughlin, echoing United States Steel's Mr. Fairless, tells the congressional committee that after exhaustive surveys of the New England situation, his company concluded that a New England plant would involve greater risk and a lower return than if Jones & Laughlin put the money into improvement of existing plant.

All of which may be true, from Big Steel's viewpoint, but only if its precious status quo can be preserved.

New England could help to kick over that status quo.

New England, any day now, might get good and sick of this business of having no friends, among either the self-styled conservatives or the self-styled liberals.

It might decide to do this steel job on its own, just as it has done everything else on its own, since the era of the New Bedford whalers.

One method—which now needs careful reexamination in the light of Big Steel's attitude—has been suggested by Governor Adams, Lawrence Whittemore, and a strong group within the New England council.

This method involves a plan of public financing which is both spectacular and risky—the so-called industrial authority plan, whereby funds are raised through public subscription, backed if necessary by the full faith and credit of the States. It involves also, if a suggestion by Mr. Whittemore is adopted, large loans by the Federal Government.

The Big Steel boys shudder at this latter suggestion. They are for free enterprise so long as it isn't too gol-durned free. They abhor Government participation.

So do we. As our readers know, we have been hesitant about endorsing the plans of Governor Adams and his colleagues.

We've been especially cautious since President Truman came out in the open and told the steel planners of the New England Council that the Federal Government looked with high favor on the idea of a New England steel mill, and would do all it could to help. Mr. Truman, it will be remembered, is the chap who not long ago threw a powerful fright into Big Steel with the suggestion of a yardstick steel mill, patterned after the TVA power yardstick.

But the attitude displayed by Big Steel, in its testimony before Congress, puts matters in a new light. The time has arrived, possibly, for a little honest soul-searching by those who have at heart the real interests of New England.

How much longer can we afford our fine spirit of autarchy and independence, in the face of cutthroat competition from such diverse quarters as Big Steel and the Fair Dealers? How much longer can we look down our long blue noses at the go-getters and free Federal spenders in rival sections, while our shoes and textiles are snowed under by Government-abetted competition, both domestic and foreign, and our brightest prospects—the mushrooming hard-goods industries—are mortally endangered by discriminatory high costs imposed arbitrarily on such basic ingredients as transportation and raw materials?

The administration free spenders obviously are simply pining to get into this New England steel picture. No doubt their motives are political. But there are enough Republicans on the scene, like Governor Adams, to insure that the political credit will be spread around, and that even if Federal funds are employed, they are used in a businesslike manner.

The New England steel mill could, in fact, be made a truly nonpartisan and nonpolitical venture. It could constitute a novel experiment in the employment of public finance to establish a privately operated basic industry essential to the health and growth of these secondary industries—all privately owned—which are New England's best hope for the future.

Most of us would go into such a project with our fingers crossed. Most of us would prefer to see the job tackled as an adventure in pure private enterprise. But if it just can't be handled that way, well—a lot of us are determined that New England isn't going to be made the national sacrificial goat forever.

ANNOUNCEMENT OF CALL OF THE CALENDAR ON WEDNESDAY

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, I should like to announce for the RECORD that, following the vote on the pending legislation, on Wednesday afternoon, I shall then move the consideration of bills on the calendar, and we shall start with the beginning of the calendar and go through to the end.

PROPOSED CHANGE IN METHOD OF ELECTION OF PRESIDENT AND VICE PRESIDENT

The Senate resumed the consideration of the resolution (S. J. Res. 2) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States providing for the election of President and Vice President.

Mr. FERGUSON. Mr. President, the heart of the resolution now pending before the Senate lies in the following proposals:

First. The electoral college and the office of elector would be abolished as being obsolete.

Second. The electoral vote, 531, would be retained in order to preserve as nearly as Senate Joint Resolution 2 makes possible the equality of the States and to maintain the relative voting strength of the States.

Third. The counting of electoral votes by the whole unit for the winning candidate in each State would be abolished, in favor of a distribution of electoral votes among candidates according to their popular votes.

Fourth. Rival presidential candidates would share the electoral votes of each State in proportion to their total popular vote therein. Since electors are eliminated, the popular-vote totals would simply be certified by State officials to the seat of the Government of the United States, directed to the President of the Senate.

Fifth. Each presidential candidate would be credited with the aggregate total of his proportionate shares of electoral votes in all the States.

Sixth. A provision that a candidate having a plurality of the electoral votes, even if it fell short of a majority, would be substituted for the present majority requirement in electing a President.

For the most part, past discussions of this and similar constitutional amendments have dealt principally with the evils of the electoral college system. What is necessary is that we make a fresh and independent study of the related question of what effect the proposed change may have on the future of American politics. The subject is far more complicated, I am fearful, than the sponsors of the resolution seem to recognize. The whole pattern of the American system is certain to be altered.

It is very important to find out what direction the change may take. Progress is change, but all change is not progress.

My colleague, the senior Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG], on the floor of the Senate, May 16, 1934, in discussing another proposal for a change in the electoral system, said:

> I realize that the spirit of innovation is upon the land. I do not complain of that. I have supported many of the innovations. I realize that many problems demand new answers, and I am not afraid of them. Let us proceed courageously with whatever statutory innovations are necessary in the face of the crisis of the time, but let us not innovate needlessly. Let us by statutory innovation innovate where the situation requires it, but only in the last and final necessity when there is no other recourse let us be innovates upon the Constitution of the United States.

I so heartily agree with this that I repeat the words of my distinguished colleague. I appreciate the spirit of reform, and shall here state my approval of some of the reforms which are proposed in Senate Joint Resolution 2. At the same time, I vigorously oppose other features of the resolution, because I believe them unwise and even dangerous to the American system of government.

I believe reforms must be handled with great care, when logic indicates they may easily go beyond the evils of the day to create other evils possibly greater than those intended to be cured. I do not favor constitutional amendments based on speculations impossible to appraise with reasonable surety as to the outcome, and I trust the people of the United States share this view. It is of tremendous significance that the amending clause of the Constitution, article V, reads:

> The Congress, whenever two-thirds of both Houses shall deem it necessary, shall propose amendments to this Constitution.

I repeat, whenever Congress "shall deem it necessary." There is sufficient warning, in those four words, that the amending process is not to be based on anything but the most certain causes and foreseeable effects.

We are apt to speak more about the evils in our system and less about the strength and the good in it. Ours has been the one outstanding Government under a written Constitution federating sovereign states into a federal government. We have been successful from the beginning with a two-party system. We have maintained the principle of majority rule with the protection of the rights of the minorities.

Our elective system has demonstrated its good qualities, notwithstanding the weakness of the electoral college, and we stand in the world today as the No. 1 Nation. Our economic position in the world is not the result of chance. It is the result of a political philosophy and of an economic system under our Constitution. Unless we can see in the future what a new system will bring us, we should not change to an unknown, unchartered course.

The pending resolution has commanded great popular appeal. First, it has the benefit of a distinguished bipartisan sponsorship. This bipartisan sponsorship would tend naturally to suppress any fear that either major party might be placed at a marked advantage or disadvantage as a consequence of its operation. Second, the resolution capitalizes on the common belief that the electoral college, as such, serves no useful purpose in our elective system. We are all familiar with caricatures of the electoral college as a bearded, outworn individual. This impression has probably attracted many supporters who have failed to grasp or to search out the full implications of the further changes proposed by Senate Joint Resolution 2.

ABOLITION OF THE ELECTORAL COLLEGE

The first feature of this resolution is to abolish presidential electors and the electoral college. The names of the Presidential and Vice Presidential candidates themselves would be placed upon the ballots, and the people would vote directly for their choices. That is true in many States today.

The reasons for this change are set forth fully in the majority report of the committee. Although it has served us well for 150 years, the electoral college has never operated as originally planned by the framers of the Constitution. The sponsors of Senate Joint Resolution 2 point out that it is an inconvenient, expensive fiction, maintained only in form. Moreover, without achieving the grand design expected of it by the founding fathers, the presidential-elector system may now be used to create uncertainty and confusion in presidential elections. In view of those considerations, and despite the fact that it has rendered no disservice, the electoral college might well be abolished, as Senate Joint Resolution 2 proposes to do. Such a reform would provide an assurance against a reversal of popular will, which might occur if members of the electoral college failed to heed their instructions. That seems to be the one thing which is emphasized more than anything else, namely, that an elector, when he comes to cast his vote is not bound to cast it according to the instructions of the voters, but may use his own discretion.

As I have said, a great deal of support for the pending resolution has come from a popular belief that it is devoted only to this worth-while reform. Getting rid of outworn machinery invariably meets with quick approval, and the idea of having it become universal practice for the people to vote directly for the candidates of their choice has strong appeal.

Senate Joint Resolution 2 benefits from these readily understandable and acceptable proposals. But if it were equally as well known that the resolution contains other elements of reform, with revolutionary consequences to the political welfare of the country, I am sure there would be serious concern about approving the resolution in its present form. Mr. President, that is the burden of my argument here today.

I am greatly distressed that a proposition as fundamentally important as the one before us has excited so little attention. We are here acting upon a change in the basic law of the land. Moreover, it is a change in one of the cardinal features of the Constitution, the elective system, and despite any contrary impressions, it is an involved change. It is a very significant thing that there was scarcely anything in the Constitutional Convention which gave our founding fathers more difficulty, and about which they took more pains, than the business of electing the Chief Executive. The considerations that were at work then are multiplied by the knowledge that today the office of President of the United States is beyond question one of the most important in the world. In anything which touches upon the methods of selecting the individual to exercise that office, we cannot proceed too deliberately, for we cannot afford to stumble.

I urge that the electoral college can be abolished and provisions made for direct voting for Presidential candidates by name, without going beyond desirable reform into unwise and dangerous changes in the American political system.

ELECTION BY PLURALITY

The resolution also provides the President and Vice President shall be chosen by a simple plurality of electoral votes instead of the present majority requirement. The purpose is to eliminate recourse to elections by the House of Representatives and by the Senate respectively, as is now required when candidates for President and Vice President fail to obtain an electoral majority.

The idea of improving upon the method of congressional referendum in cases where no clear electoral-vote majority is gained from the popular vote undoubtedly represents a desired reform. The possibility of throwing an election into the House, where voting is on a State basis, with no reflection of popular choice, has long been held a weakness in the elective system.

But reform is one thing; radical change is quite another. To pass over from a requirement that a candidate must receive a majority of electoral votes to his election by simple plurality is indeed such a radical change.

The fathers of this country took special care to see that a person elected as President attained a clear majority of the total electoral vote. They knew the evils which arise when a Chief Executive assumes office, backed only by weak support of a plurality of the total electoral vote.

It is true, I know, that on 12 occasions a President of the United States has been elected without having had a majority of the popular vote. The present President is one of these minority Presidents. But rather than improve upon that situation, the proposal to elect by plurality is almost certain to perpetuate it. The condition will be perpetuated because it is a certain invitation for many parties to enter the field, if a plurality only is required. That means a break-down of the two-party system as we know it. While that two-party system is unknown to the Constitution, it is one of the most constructive features of American government. It may be put forward that we have succeeded in maintaining the desirable two-party system because parties have had to remain large and coordinated in order to secure the electoral majority required in the Constitution.

To illustrate the consequences which might follow from a plurality rather than a majority requirement, it would be possible for a candidate with a totalitarian philosophy to be elected President, with only 30 percent of the popular and electoral vote, even though bitterly opposed by 70 percent of the people voting for three or more other candidates.

This is by no means a remote possibility. Wherever plurality decisions are provided for as in Senate Joint Resolution 2, there is an ever-present tendency toward minority control. A well-organized, compact minority may easily prevail over scattered, divided majorities. We saw this in the field of corporate control, when small, compact minorities gained dominance over a corporation even when the minority had 10 percent or less of the stockholder vote. We see it in the field of labor organization. How is it thought the Communists gained control over the United Electrical Workers, CIO? Was it because the thousands of loyal American union workers wanted Communist control? By no means was that a reason. A small Communist minority, knowing exactly what they wanted, used the union election machinery to gain control over the unorganized majority of the union membership.

Furthermore, it is never enough to say that a possibility is remote when a failure to guard against such a possibility may be fatal. The supporters of representative government must win every battle; their opponents need only one victory and it is over for the future.

Merely because the present procedure for congressional referendum is unsatisfactory, we should not abandon all protection against the plurality election of extremists who are opposed by a large majority of the people.

PROTECTION OF THE TWO-PARTY SYSTEM

It is not alone the election of unpopular extremists against which we should guard, however. We must guard against any break-down of the two-party system which has served America so well. Any break-down of the two-party system would bring on what my able and distinguished colleague [Mr. VANDENBERG] in 1934 called the continental curse of European politics, namely, multiple parties, bloc government, group control, minority administration of the affairs of the people.

Mr. President, it has recently been reported in the press that in the next Greek election there will be 86 parties.

I only wish that I might digress here to dwell at length on the qualities of the two-party system. That system represents a vertical alinement of interests which isolates the lunatic fringes and permits the shadings at the center to move forward effectively. It represents a concentration of responsibility, where we can affirm on the one hand and deny on the other. Any break-up of party solidarity means a diffusion of responsibility which deprives the people of an opportunity to speak effectively on any issue.

It is perhaps the best commentary on the importance and durability of the two-party system that this country has known 70 political parties in its history, each of which has elected at least one Member of Congress. But each one, and in a very short time, disappeared or was absorbed in one of the two major parties. This did not happen by luck or chance. The electoral system itself had much to do with it.

The only possible alternative to the two-party system is government by coalition, which is common in Europe. That is divided responsibility, with authority centered only temporarily in a ministry. Because the ministry possesses no other responsibility, it must of necessity also possess the power to dissolve the legislature, so that any issue upon which the government divides may be sent directly to the people for decision. Our Constitution does not make such a provision, and we do not want it, for we prefer to substitute the discipline of effective party responsibility.

I might observe here that the Democratic Party must soon face up to this matter of party responsibility. It is only a matter of time before the people are going to demand an accounting for the divided responsibility which exists within that party. When that day comes, there will be a regeneration of political rivalry, particularly in the South, which no artificial device, such as Senate Joint Resolution 2, could promote. The people's demand for party solidarity and undivided responsibility assures genuine two-party competition.

As a matter of fact, Mr. President, so long as we maintain and do not tamper with the two-party system, any need of avoiding the eventuality which occurs when a Presidential candidate fails to obtain a majority of the electoral vote would be rare. But if there is a need to improve upon the present method of congressional referendum, I think there is a far better solution than by-passing it completely by requiring only an electoral plurality.

I have prepared an amendment to Senate Joint Resolution 2 which I now send to the desk, Mr. President, and which I will explain at a later time, before we vote on the pending business. In brief, this amendment would correct any defects in the electoral-college system and would preserve and strengthen the constitutional provisions for congressional referendum in Presidential elections.

PROPORTIONAL COUNTING OF ELECTORAL VOTES

Senate Joint Resolution 2 provides that in recording a State's electoral votes, they shall be credited to respective candidates in proportion to their popular votes in each State, and then totaled for each candidate for the Nation as a whole.

This is the most revolutionary and the most controversial of the changes proposed by Senate Joint Resolution 2. As sponsors of the resolution freely admit, this proportionate division of electoral votes will work decided changes in voting habits, in the make-up of the political party system as we know it in this country, and upon the conduct of Presidential election campaigns.

Under the present system, commonly called the unit rule, the candidate receiving the most votes in each State receives the whole of the State's electoral vote. Further, he has to get an absolute majority of all electoral votes in the Nation and more than any other candidate to win the Presidency.

Senate Joint Resolution 2 proposes to abolish this system, and in its place to divide up the electoral votes in each State in the proportions indicated by the popular vote. A radical candidate who had no hope of election in one or a group of States under the present system could add up all his electoral votes in all 48 States, under Senate Joint Resolution 2, and make a strong showing. He would not need a majority to win. A plurality—merely one vote more than the next highest candidate—would be enough under Senate Joint Resolution 2. Then, if there were three or four candidates in the field, a radical candidate with 30 percent of the vote could become the Chief Executive.

The intention of a proportional counting system is to reflect mathematically the popular will. Such a perfect reflection is not possible under our Federal system. Regardless of population, each State is assured one electoral vote for each Representative from the State in the House of Representatives, and two additional votes signifying its equality with all other States in the Senate.

Mr. President, under the present system, if the population of a State were to be reduced to 5,000 people, that State, under the federated principle, would have three electoral votes, because it would be entitled to one Representative in the House of Representatives and two Senators on the floor of the Senate.

The result is that only 82 percent of the electoral vote represents population, while 18 percent is assured to the States regardless of population by reason of the fact that each State has two Senators.

The situation is further complicated by the fact that no electoral vote represents actual popular voting as such. In States where actual voting is high, an electoral vote counts for many times the popular vote in a State where the turnout of popular votes is low. I shall show the effect of this later on in my argument.

PROPOSAL AFFECTS FEDERALIZATION

Given the electoral system as a necessary corollary of federalization, and barring the difference between States in voting intensity, those who want to see the popular vote most accurately reflected might be expected to espouse a system of direct voting for President and Vice President, whereby the gross popular vote in the Nation would be counted alone. As a matter of fact, the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], who is the principal sponsor of Senate Joint Resolution 2, has put forward such a proposal in the past, and I believe still favors it, although his feeling would be, as he remarked in the hearings, "One war at a time." He is a realist, and he has written that "to eliminate the credit given for Senators (that is, the two extra electoral votes), or to eliminate any electoral allotment to each State would destroy any possibility at all of electoral reform."

I agree with that. The system of government which we have is a federated system. The various parts have kept together. It has been successful because it has been a federated system. The fact that the great State of New York has only two votes in the Senate, and the State of Wyoming or Montana, let us say, with a very small population, also has two votes, is what helps to keep us together as a federated Union. If we wipe out what cements the States together as a federated Union, Mr. President, we will find to our regret that the federation has been weakened, and possibly even dissolved. In other words, sponsors of direct popular election run head on into the expression of sovereignty by the federated States which wish to preserve the privileges and status accorded them under federation.

Finding it impossible to break down the resistance built up by the federated principle, Senate Joint Resolution 2 seeks to cross the privileges accorded in federation and installed in the electoral vote with another system for representing popular will by proportionate counting of the electoral votes. In other words, Mr. President, what they wish to do is to cross the two systems. The electoral votes are retained, but counting by State units is abolished. The paradox in that result is that by indirection the States are required to surrender their sovereignty over the disposition of their own electoral votes.

A change in the American political system so far reaching as this is bound to produce strong arguments for and against the wisdom of the change. Fortunately, I believe the hearings on Senate Joint Resolution 2 are about the most complete the Congress has ever had on proposals of this nature. Opposing points of view are aired more exhaustively than ever before, although even fuller exploration may be desired. The point I wish to emphasize, however, is that most of the arguments offered in these hearings are speculative, because it cannot be known in advance what changes will be worked in voting habits, in political parties, and in the conduct of presidential elections. The sponsors of the resolution and the majority report take the view that all the proposed changes will be beneficial, with no ill effects on the American system of government.

Mr. President, I cannot agree with these conclusions. It is my considered judgment that the arguments and conclusions which have been set forth by the sponsors and adopted in the majority report rest too heavily on doubtful speculations. It is my further considered judgment that until the implications and consequences of this radical change in counting votes can be more definitely appraised, this part of the resolution should be disapproved, and it should not become an issue upon which the legislatures might vote.

THE CONSTITUTION SHOULD NOT BE AMENDED ON A SPECULATIVE BASIS

It is well to repeat that, while all progress is change, not all change is progress. The wise man does not discard the old for the new until he is reasonably certain that the new will be an improvement, without harmful effects. Reason and logic simply do not support the conclusions which its sponsors draw from Senate Joint Resolution 2. The framers of the Constitution took exceeding care to make the amendment process difficult in order to discourage amendments on frivolous or speculative grounds. They knew the great importance of stability in law and tradition. They most assuredly were of the opinion that the Constitution should not be amended on any speculative basis.

While the facts and arguments in the hearings speak for themselves, it may be useful for those who must act on this important question if I comment upon the principal points raised by the speculations on this change in the country's political system.

Throughout the hearings there was much speculation on the prospective advantages and disadvantages likely to accrue to one political party or another from proportionate sharing of electoral votes. The interest so aroused is natural and wholesome.

Thus, whether the Republican Party may gain more from a sharing of electoral votes in the South than it loses by sharing its areas of strength in the North, or whether the Democratic Party may find it more to their liking to surrender strength in the South for possible gains elsewhere, are certainly questions for these parties to consider carefully. Whether both major parties can afford to accept a device which may easily transfer their strength to third and fourth parties is also something they may rightfully consider in view of the great advantages of a two-party system.

The hearings contain much speculation on this point, worthy of careful study. With a century of remarkably stable political tradition behind them, in which political power has been shared by the two major parties in fairly even balance, they may wish before making radical changes, to give some weight to the notable quotation in the Federalist Papers on the spirit of injustice to the effect that "No man can be sure that he may not be tomorrow the victim of that by which he may be a gainer today."

Mr. President, I do not oppose this change because of any fear of adverse consequences to any particular political party or interest. I stand upon the broader ground of the effect radical change will have upon the American political system as a whole. My opposition goes straight to the wisdom in reason and logic of dividing up the electoral vote as proposed in Senate Joint Resolution 2. I find no values to be gained, and many to lose by it. In some respects, I see great harm possible in making so vital a change in our political system when the consequences cannot be fully appraised. This is not a change which once made can be easily undone if found unwise. As we all know, for sound reasons it has been made difficult to amend the Constitution.

SENATE JOINT RESOLUTION 2 FOSTERS MINORITY ELECTIONS

Those who favor proportional sharing of a State's electoral vote emphasize the point that it will eliminate or at least minimize the possibility of a president being elected without a majority, or even a plurality of the popular vote. This is an absurdity. The very basis of Senate Joint Resolution 2 is plurality election. On its face the resolution makes possible the election of minority candidates.

In discussing the matter of an election by plurality, I have observed that "minority" Presidents have not been uncommon. This comes largely from another fact upon which I have commented, that electoral votes, while representing population generally, except for the two senatorial votes, do not represent popular voting. In one State, for example, an electoral vote may represent more than 130,000 popular votes, while in another it may represent less than 12,000 popular votes.

Nothing in Senate Joint Resolution 2 guarantees a more equitable balance, because the factors which make for this inequality go far deeper than mere political rules. It is a principle argument advanced on behalf of Senate Joint Resolution 2 that it would tend to lessen that inequality.

Admittedly, some of the disparity might be removed by the division of the electoral votes, but other factors, such as the difference caused by allotting two senatorial votes without reference to population, would remain to create disparities under the proposed scheme. Moreover, new causes for minority Presidents are quite possible under the proportionate sharing of electoral votes.

As a matter of fact, it has been effectively demonstrated by opponents of Senate Joint Resolution 2 that the possibility of a minority President is a probability when the solid South is considered relative to the rest of the country. That situation cannot be changed, short of a radical shift in the voting habits of the South.

To illustrate, normally solid Mississippi, with nine electoral votes might give one party an electoral advantage of 8.5 votes, when they are counted proportionally. This margin might be gained by a popular plurality of 172,000. In Michigan, as a State which is typically more evenly divided and with a greater election turn-out, it would take a popular plurality of approximately 980,000 votes for the opposite party to offset the electoral advantage in the single State of Mississippi.

Let me repeat that. Under the proposed amendment of the Constitution a popular plurality of approximately 980,000 votes would be required for the opposite party to offset the 8½ electoral votes which would result to the advantage of the other party in the single State of Mississippi by a popular plurality in that State of 172,000 votes. Would the adoption of the amendment proposed by the joint resolution cure such an evil? No, Mr. President.

I am aware of the argument that statistics based on general elections in the South should not be relied upon, because a greater number of ballots is cast in primaries. Is it not reasonable to assume, however, that the great number of primary votes which are not cast in the general election are a reservoir of strength for the principal party? That being so, any greater turn-out in the general election would merely aggravate the unbalance in the electoral vote under proportional counting.

The sponsors of Senate Joint Resolution 2 insist, of course, that voting habits everywhere, and particularly in the South, would be so radically changed as to bring about a state of balance. The chance to get electoral votes, say the sponsors of Senate Joint Resolution 2, offers an incentive to Republicans, for example, to campaign and make headway in the South. But is not the relatively small number of votes necessary to capture a southern State's electoral votes also an incentive for the Republicans to move into the South? Has not that incentive always been there, and have the Republicans ever been able to take advantage of it?

These matters of prospective changes in voting habits are pure speculation, incapable of proof or demonstration. But it is worth while to consider this argument further.

If proportional sharing of the vote in the solid South offers an incentive for Republicans to make progress there, why would not the chance for electoral votes on a sharing basis offer incentives to minority groups all over the country, since the Republican Party is nothing more nor less than a minority party in the South.

When sponsors of the resolution wish to appeal to Republicans, they cite the chance for them to get electoral votes in the South. But when critics point out that the same incentive is held out to minority groups elsewhere and everywhere, the sponsors pooh-pooh the idea. They can hardly have it both ways.

PROPORTIONAL COUNTING FOSTERS MULTIPLE PARTIES

I firmly believe the proportionate sharing of electoral votes is a direct encouragement to the growth of multiple parties. As I have discussed this possibility in another connection, such a prospect carries grave implications. It would mean an end to the two-party system which has been so instrumental in preserving political stability and responsible government. In its place would come splinter factions and multiple parties which have plagued and retarded representative government wherever they have appeared.

Under the present unit system, minority political groups, usually advocating extreme views, rarely attract enough votes to capture the electoral vote of a State. At most, they can swing their voting strength between the two major parties. Sponsors of the resolution deplore this nuisance value of minority parties and pressure groups. I can see considerable good in them to the two-party system. Their inability to gain electoral votes under the unit rule deprives them of incentive to remain compact and to grow as individual parties. At the same time, their limited voting strength is enough to cause ferment in the major parties which are forced to clean house, and adopt new ideas to gain the aid of minority groups. The result is to prevent fragmentation into multiple parties with all its attendant evils and to preserve and to invigorate the two-party system. Under the resolution, these minority groups will have an incentive and opportunity to grow on their own. I believe that is exactly what would happen if the amendment were ratified, and became the supreme law of the land.

Their share of electoral votes in each State and accumulated total across the Nation would provide a score card for their progress. The shining goal would be to divide and conquer the major parties by splintering. The resolution makes this easier and attractive because it requires only a plurality of electoral votes to win. Minorities need not bid for a majority. With enough independent factions on the voting scene, a compact minority group of 40 percent or less in electoral vote can gain a major victory. Why do the sponsors of the resolution deny this possibility when they freely admit that the sharing of electoral votes offers an incentive for the major parties to campaign in each other's strongholds, such as the Democratic South and let us say Republican Maine? What makes them think that dissatisfied voters will turn only from one major party to the other when electoral votes, essential to victory, offer them incentives? Even the existing unit rule has permitted a demonstration of what dissatisfied voters may do. When southern voters in the 1948 election became dissatisfied with their own Democrat Party, they did not turn to the Republican Party, but set up a third independent group, the Dixiecrats.

EXPERIENCE IN THE 1948 ELECTION

How, in the face of this clear demonstration of exactly what southerners will do, can the sponsors of this resolution persist in the claim that only the two major parties will share the votes of the South? How can southerners support this resolution in the belief that it will strengthen the Democrats or, at the most, encourage Republicans, when the 1948 election proved otherwise.

Mr. KEFAUVER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MURRAY in the chair). Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. FERGUSON. I am glad to yield.

Mr. KEFAUVER. The Senator has asked why we in the South think this proposal would strengthen the two-party system and would not lead to the formation of third parties or splinter parties in the South.

Our idea is that under the system here proposed, if put into effect, both political parties, instead of conceding or marking off the electoral votes of the South, would fight for and work for votes in the South just as they do in the pivotal States, and therefore the problems of the South and of States in a similar situation would receive more consideration by the platform writers and policy makers of the two major political parties. Likewise, the voters of the South and of other sections of the country would find better representation and a stronger voice in the programs and policies of the two major political parties, and consequently would stay with those two major parties.

In my opinion—and my opinion is different from that of the Senator from Michigan—inevitably that would be the result of the passage of Senate Joint Resolution 2 and the adoption of the constitutional amendment it proposes.

Mr. FERGUSON. Mr. President, I answer the Senator by saying that what he has just stated is a speculation which has been disproved by actual fact. The actual fact is that in 1948 when the South disagreed with the Democratic Party, some of the Southern States bolted the Democratic Party at the convention. Did they come over to the Republican Party? Oh, no, Mr. President. Instead, they formed their own party, a splinter party, the Dixiecrat Party. There is the fact; that is what happened.

Mr. President, anyone who is aware of the voting habits of the South must know that the Southern States are not going to join the other major political party. They demonstrated that beyond any question in the 1948 elections, when they formed a splinter party.

Mr. KEFAUVER. Does not the Senator believe it is a fact that the platforms and programs of both the major political parties are written, to a considerable extent, in order to attract the voters of the so-called pivotal States, and that, so far as relates to the South and certain other States which historically have gone either one way or the other, the platform writers and policy makers of the two major political parties in framing the platforms are not so much concerned with them as they are with the problems and conditions of special groups in the pivotal States? Is not that one of the reasons why the Republican Party has not made greater headway in the South?

Mr. FERGUSON. No; I do not think that is the reason, so far as the South is concerned. I think the Senator from Tennessee knows of a much better reason for the situation in the South.

Mr. KEFAUVER. Does not the Senator from Michigan agree, having worked intimately with the Republican National Committee, that usually the masterminds of the two political parties before the election separately decide which States are worth working for? In other words, they decide that certain States will go Democratic in any event, so that there is no use in doing anything in them, for instance, perhaps in Tennessee or South Carolina; while, on the other hand, the Democratic high command may think Georgia or Alabama will be Democratic in any event, so there is no use in putting on any election campaign in those States or in particularly considering their problems in connection with the writing of the platform. So the battlefield finally dwindles down to some 11 or 12 States where ordinarily the votes are close. Does not that occur?

Mr. FERGUSON. I think the Senator is correct in regard to the writing of the platforms, but I think it will be found that the platforms are written having in mind the centers of population and the centers of property, as well as individuals. If we are to continue to have a two-party system, then we shall have to do just what the parties have been doing in the past. If we are to develop the same philosophy that France has developed, then we will have the Central States with a platform and a party, the Eastern States with a platform and a party, the Southern States with a platfrom and a party, the far Western States, even the Mountain States, with their platform and their party; and then we shall have parties such as a farmers' party, a labor party, a business party; and the first thing we know we shall be electing a President of the United States with as little as 25 percent of the popular vote, because under this proposed elective system all a successful candidate will need will be a plurality of the votes; and the one who could rally the largest popular vote under such a split situation would become President of the United States.

Mr. KEFAUVER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

Mr. FERGUSON. I yield.

Mr. KEFAUVER. I do not wish to infringe unduly upon the Senator's time by going into detail regarding the matter now under discussion. I expect to answer the Senator's argument later this afternoon.

But I wish to say that the strengthening of our presidential election system by having two real national, Nation-wide parties, is one of the principal reasons why I have been so much interested in the pending joint resolution.

I should like to call the Senator's attention to the fact that in most of the States, the governors and other State officials are elected on a plurality basis. Yet we have seen less development of so-called splinter parties or third parties or minority parties in the States of the Union than we have in the Federal Government under the electoral-college system. This leads the junior Senator from Tennessee to the conclusion that the people of the Nation believe in, appreciate the value of, and wish to sustain the two-party system, and are not going to support multiple parties, as have the French people. That is evidenced by the fact that throughout the United States there have been so few splinter parties in State elections.

However, if we ever develop a system whereby all sections of the country are considered by the two major political parties, then we shall have a strengthening, not a deterioration, of the two-party system.

Mr. FERGUSON. Mr. President, I cannot agree that that is the reason why the State elections have not led to the formation of splinter parties. I think a State is dominated by what occurs in the national scene. In each of the States the important election is the presidential election; it overshadows all other elections. The presidential election is very definitely the largest, most important election. Therefore, the parties line up behind the candidates for Senator and Representatives and the presidential candidate. That is what keeps the States from developing splinter parties, whereas the adoption of the proposed plurality counting method would have the opposite effect.

If southerners open the door to minority parties, they will not be able to confine party allegiance to the two major parties and to the Dixiecrat Party. Throughout the Nation today there are threats to our political system as a result of other parties which wish to take over. Splinter parties are already on the horizon. And nowhere is the ferment more active than in the South. Strong minorities are growing there. Open the door for them with Senate Joint Resolution 2, and radical parties will rise up to plague both major parties, if not to destroy the two-party system altogether.

The present electoral system forces radicals to temper their actions and work within the two-party system. Senate Joint Resolution 2 turns them loose and gives them a strong incentive to build their own strength. Then, by only a plurality requirement, it gives a radical minority an easy chance to dominate the majority.

Let us consider, Mr. President, what Representative WRIGHT PATMAN said on this subject. He saw what was going to happen, and I wish to quote what he said. He is an outstanding student of American Government, and is one southerner who has seen this thing clearly. At page 181 of the Senate hearings, he has put his finger on the key by saying:

> What attracted my attention about this resolution was not what was being said in its favor, but the failure of certain groups to express opposition to it. In other words, I wondered why the left-wingers or the communistic groups did not say something about it. I also wondered why the ultraconservative, reactionary, Fascist-minded groups did not express opposition to it. I concluded that possibly each minority group felt like it was a step in the direction of giving them an opportunity to elect a President. If this resolution is adopted and ratified by the States, it will be the most heartening news minority groups have received in a long time. It will then be possible for minority groups to be recognized by actually receiving electoral votes of their own, which has not been possible in the past.

THE "DISFRANCHISED VOTER" ARGUMENT

Sponsors of the resolution make much of the disfranchisement of voters under the present system. They speak of votes being lost, or counted for the opposition. But, under their resolution, a plurality winner may have only 40 percent or less of the electoral votes. What of the defeated majority, with 60 percent of the votes? Are their votes not lost, too, or considered as counted for the minority winner? As a matter of fact, I cannot become excited over the argument of lost votes. It seems to me to be only an appeal for popular support for the resolution, an appeal without real substance in reason and logic. In every election where there can be but a single winner, all votes cast for the losing candidates can be said to be lost. Sponsors of the resolution would merely transfer the lost votes so-called from the State to the national level. In truth, no votes are lost when validly cast in an election. They are counted toward whatever the final decision is, whether it be the unit of an electoral majority or the plurality of electoral votes, and if found insufficient to win, they have simply exhausted their power as votes.

This is well understood under the present system and accepted as a normal part of the political machinery, because an electoral majority is always necessary in order to win. But under the resolution, would minority voters be satisfied to lose if, together, they received 60 percent of the vote, while the plurality candidate took office with only 40 percent of the vote? Would they not claim that giving them a share in the electoral vote was equally inequitable, if this share became lost at the national level? Would they not clamor for more effective minority representation? This is where the whole idea of proportional representation arises under the resolution. Witnesses at the hearings did not claim that the resolution is itself an example of proportional representation. They did not have to be told humorously by the sponsors that a single executive cannot be divided into proportional parts. But they claim that the sharing of electoral votes among candidates for President, in order to give each minority a voice, is the first step toward full proportional representation in the Congress and in the Government.

THE BEGINNINGS OF BLOC GOVERNMENT

Third parties, given the incentive of a chance to elect a President, will maintain their identity by putting up full slates for Congress. It is this which in the end will give us bloc government. Minorities, given a voice, will not be satisfied when their voice is canceled out or lost, as it would be under the proposed scheme. Their dissatisfaction will mount further, if a plurality winner receives only 40 percent of the total electoral vote. They will then demand full proportional representation in the Congress and on Government boards and commissions, just as the two major parties do now, because they are too strong to be ignored. We have certain laws now providing that the two major parties shall have representation on commissions and boards. If such a thing becomes possible under the law, and if it occurs, as it seems indicated it will, the demand will be that other minorities, and lesser minorities, have such representation. It is at this stage that proportional representation, as in France and other parts of Europe, is likely to flower from Senate Joint Resolution 2. And wherever proportional representation, so-called, is at work, government has been plagued, confused, and weakened. The existing system of counting electoral votes has avoided that. It has preserved the two-party system, by which Government has been held stable and responsible.

THE WEAKENING OF FEDERALISM

I see also in abandonment of the unit rule for recording electoral votes a decided weakening of the principle which created and held together the Federal Union, namely, the preservation of the independence of the States.

To be sure, the proposal of sharing electoral votes does not go so far as would direct election by popular vote, which would altogether wipe out State lines in Federal elections. But while the State's electoral votes are preserved in the new scheme, their allocations by proportions does represent a definite weakening of federalism. As I have indicated earlier, a requirement that a State's electoral votes be broken up by proportional allocation is nothing but a surrender of the State's sovereign rights over that bloc of votes.

A sharing of electoral votes would leave the small States smaller than ever in influence, and the large States greatly reduced in proportion. Nevada's influence, for instance, would be reduced from an assured electoral vote of three to a minute fraction, depending on the closeness of the popular vote. In 1948, Delaware's place in the electoral vote would have been a nullity. In Michigan, a typically close popular vote would reduce the State's electoral influence from 19 to a fraction of 1. To illustrate, a popular plurality of 50,000 in Michigan would result in the State's having a net influence upon the electoral result of just one-half a vote. In other words, of a total popular vote of more than 2,000,000, Michigan, having gone one way by a majority of 50,000, would in effect have a vote in the electoral college of one-half vote only.

What does this do to the principle of giving populous States a voice comparable with their weight in population, taxation, and economic and social activity? I have remarked that some of the sponsors of Senate Joint Resolution 2 have indicated no hesitancy in their willingness to go the whole length toward direct popular Federal election. They have been held back only because of the practical impossibility of getting the idea approved by States which jealously guard their independent status. They want to to take one step at a time, and Senate Joint Resolution 2 is a good step in the direction of obliteration of States lines, at a time when it seems obvious to all that the spread of Federal power at the expense of States is already far-reaching.

FEDERAL CONTROL OF ELECTIONS WOULD FOLLOW

This weakening of the States gives rise also to serious question of whether complete Federal control of elections might not legally and logically follow. Have those who believe in States' rights considered this question? For instance, if a candidate is to receive credit, by constitutional provision, for the proportion of popular votes cast for him, as provided by Senate Joint Resolution 2, could he not demand that in order to receive complete credit nationally, a State should be required to place his name on the ballot? The States now jealously guard their prerogative to control the ballot. But how can they maintain this position after they have accepted the idea that a candidate with popular votes is entitled to a share of electoral votes?

A candidate could make an unanswerable argument against any State law that would keep him off the ballot. He could say that the Constitution, as amended by Senate Joint Resolution 2, guaranteed him a share in electoral votes in proportion to his popular vote. But the election machinery of Illinois, or New York, or Mississippi is contrived to keep his name off the ballot, and thus to deprive him of his popular vote? That was done in 1949, in the case of Mr. Wallace, in the State of Illinois. This, in effect, would deprive him of his share of electoral votes which the Constitution, the highest law of the land, guarantees him. How can he be guaranteed a right by the Constitution and then be deprived of its fruits by State law? How can he be given a benefit and be deprived of the means to enjoy it? Under the present system, the States are masters in their own house. Under Senate Joint Resolution 2, State lines are wiped out. Elections for President become national operations with a candidate's rights guaranteed by the Constitution.

I feel certain the courts will say that if the Constitution guarantees a candidate a share in electoral votes proportionate to popular votes, he has to be given a chance to go into every State in search of popular votes, whatever State laws provide to the contrary. With arguments like this, the pressure for Federal control of election laws will be irresistible.

Sponsors of the resolution declare they have no intention of altering State election laws, but how can they so confidently eliminate the future pressures which their resolution, in plain logic, is bound to generate. On the face of their own resolution, they are already altering State laws when they propose to force a division of electoral votes.

THE POSITION OF SENATOR NORRIS

Before I conclude, Mr. President, I would like to draw upon the testimony of one of the great advocates of electoral reform in the past. I refer to the late Senator George Norris, of Nebraska.

In the Seventy-third Congress, Senator Norris introduced Senate Joint Resolution 29. As introduced, that resolution was identical with Senate Joint Resolution 2 of the Eighty-first Congress, except that the latter provides, when there is a tie for the highest number of electoral votes, the candidate having the greatest popular vote will be declared elected. The Norris resolution also provided that where the votes cast in any State for any candidate amounted to less than 1 percent of the vote for President in that State, that candidate's votes would be disregarded in the counting. It will be noticed he was afraid of a so-called "splinter" party's going below even the 1 percent vote.

In particular, the resolutions are identical in their provision for a division of a State's electoral vote in proportion to popular vote, which is called a dominating feature of Senate Joint Resolution 2.

After consideration by the Judiciary Committee of the Seventy-third Congress, of which Senator Norris was the ranking minority member and former chairman, the Norris resolution was reported to the Senate, stripped of that provision for proportional counting of electoral votes. In other words, they took away from that resolution the real meat and it is sought to be reinstated in the pending resolution.

The version which was reported would have installed the so-called unit system of counting a State's electoral votes as a part of the Constitution. It introduced the novel feature of requiring that a candidate have only 35 percent of the electoral vote, instead of a majority, to be elected President. This is a refinement of the mere plurality requirements in the current resolution.

In other words, the late Senator Norris and those who were with him in sponsoring the resolution thought they might bring about a split into splinter parties so that a President could be elected with less than 35 percent of the electoral unit of votes.

In explaining this abandonment of the proportional voting scheme, the late Senator Norris said on the floor of the Senate on May 16, 1934:

> The committee, after a great deal of discussion, concluded, I think with practical unanimity, that it would be unwise to permit a proportional vote to be cast according to the number of votes that a candidate received in a particular State. I myself became convinced that to permit the division of the vote of a State between different candidates in proportion to the total vote in a Presidential contest would be injurious in the end.

Senator Norris went on further to say:

> While I believe that is a sound position; that in theory it is perfect; and that we ought to have such a system; in the first place we could not get it adopted because, in my judgment, the States would never ratify it, and that was also the judgment of the committee.

This was George Norris warning the Senate and the people with regard to what he had proposed and what this joint resolution proposes. He said:

> In the next place, it would be a very great inducement to fraud all over the country. Every fraudulent vote that was put into a ballot box in Philadelphia—

I do not know why he selected Philadelphia, but he said:

> Every fraudulent vote that was put into a ballot box in Philadelphia would be counted in the selection of a President of the United States, whereas under present conditions its effect stops within the State of Pennsylvania.

In other words, he wanted the vote cast in a State to remain in the State and to speak only for the State, and not for the other States of the Union, and not to be able to dilute legitimate votes cast in another State.

I read further from what Senator Norris said:

> If a State is one-sided in an election, as that State usually is, in the final result there would be no harm, but everywhere in the United States, if the proportional voting system were adopted, as this amendment originally provided, there would be an inducement to have cast as many fraudulent votes as possible.

NORRIS REPUDIATED PLURALITY AND PROPORTIONAL COUNTING PROPOSALS

The Norris resolution was further amended on the floor to require a majority, instead of 35 percent, of the electoral vote to elect a President.

Senator Robinson asked Senator Norris, who had offered this further amendment:

> The Senator has become convinced it is better not to permit an election by popular vote of what may be termed a minority candidate?

Senator Norris replied, "That is true."

In short Mr. President, we have the testimony here of one of the great reform advocates of the past repudiating precisely the two points in Senate Joint Resolution 2 against which I have raised objection, namely plurality elections and proportional counting of electoral votes.

There, Mr. President, was an example of a truly liberal mind in operation. Senator Norris believed he saw the need for a fundamental reform. He proposed it. When its weaknesses were impressed upon him, he altered it. The significant thing is that the weaknesses which he came to recognize and which he withdrew were exactly the two great weaknesses of the Senate joint resolution which is now before the Senate.

SUMMARY

Mr. President, I mean no reflection upon the sincere purposes of those who sponsor Senate Joint Resolution 2, but advocates of reform suffer constantly from undernourished foresight. They are so taken with current evils and so confident they have the specific cure, that they resolutely refuse to believe the reform--or what they propose as a reform—in other words, a change—will go beyond what they plan for it. They are sure it will stop exactly where they want it to stop.

In the case of Senate Joint Resolution 2, the sponsors believe there will be no more lost votes, and no consequences if lost votes are not made completely effective by full proportional representation. They believe a plurality requirement in place of a majority electoral vote will not produce minority Presidents. They see no rise of splinter factions and minority parties, although they provide direct and powerful incentives for the growth of such groups. They naively believe their proposal will open up the "solid" South only to Republicans and not to many minority parties outside the major parties, and will permit only the Democrats to share in Republican strongholds and not other parties. They believe that a further weakening of the Federal principle by Federal guaranties to candidates of a share in electoral votes will not lead to further Federal invasion of State election procedure. They feel that because they set up a very limited form of proportional representation, no drive to make it completely effective at the congressional and governmental level will ever materialize.

For my own part, Mr. President, I would not dream of changing the fundamental law of the land on the basis of any such optimistic speculation.

Mr. MALONE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HUNT in the chair). Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. FERGUSON. I am happy to yield to the Senator from Nevada.

Mr. MALONE. Mr. President, I should like to ask as to the effect of voting directly for the President and Vice President and counting the proportionate votes for each. With three or more candidates for office, it is very rarely the case that a third party would cast a majority of the votes.

Mr. FERGUSON. I would say it could have this effect: If a candidate had any strength at all in the various States he might make a sufficient number of electoral votes so that the third-party candidate and one of the others would actually have a majority of the electoral votes and elect a minority President. If we expand that to four or five candidates, which was the case in one of our past elections, the vote might be thrown to a minority President. Mr. Wilson was a minority President.

Mr. MALONE. One further question. Has there been an analysis made of the history of the votes for Presidents to indicate how often that might have happened, in other words, throwing the election to a candidate who would not otherwise have been elected?

Mr. FERGUSON. I believe the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] has already put that information into the RECORD. Here is the answer which is given by the sponsors in that connection: We cannot go according to past elections, because there would be a change in the habit of the voting population by virtue of this joint resolution if the constitutional amendment it proposes should finally be adopted.

If we were to apply the proposed amendment, as I have stated, to the State of Michigan, it would be found that the State of Michigan cast more than 2,000,000 votes. The Republican Party won the election in 1948 by a majority of approximately 50,000 votes. Michigan has 17 Representatives and 2 Senators. There would be 9¼ electoral votes for the Democratic candidate, Mr. Truman, and 9¾ electoral votes for the Republican candidate, Mr. Dewey; in other words, there would be a variation of half a vote.

Let us take some of the Southern States. There we find a variation of eight or nine votes, or only slightly less than whatever their number of electoral votes may be, because the election is one-sided. The claim is made that all we, as Republicans, have to do is to go to the South, campaign there, and build up the Republican Party.

Mr. MALONE. I thank the Senator from Michigan for his answer.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, will the Senator from Michigan yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HOLLAND in the chair). Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. FERGUSON. I yield.

Mr. LODGE. Has the Senator completed his remarks?

Mr. FERGUSON. I have.

Mr. LODGE. I should like to ask the Senator five or six questions.

Mr. FERGUSON. I shall be glad to have the Senator ask them.

Mr. LODGE. The Senator does not think, does he, that it is a bad thing to have a President elected by a plurality?

Mr. FERGUSON. I do think it is a bad thing.

Mr. LODGE. Does the Senator think it was bad that Abraham Lincoln was elected, although he received only 39 percent of the popular vote?

Mr. FERGUSON. I think it is better for a candidate to receive a majority.

Mr. LODGE. Does the Senator think it was a bad thing that 12 Presidents in our history, including Wilson, Cleveland, Harrison, Garfield, and Truman, were elected by a plurality of the popular vote?

Mr. FERGUSON. I still think it was a bad thing. I think it would have been much better if they had received a majority. As the Senator has said, Abraham Lincoln was elected with only 39 percent of the popular vote. The Senator can see how a third, fourth, or fifth party can put up a candidate and elect a President when only 25 percent of the people want him as President and 75 percent do not want him.

Mr. LODGE. If 25 percent of the American people want to be Socialists, 25 percent want to be Democrats, 25 percent want to be Republicans, and 25 percent want to be Communists, does the Senator think there is any law or any constitutional amendment that can stop them from taking those positions if they desire to do so?

Mr. FERGUSON. No; but I hope we can guard against exploitation by a determined, compact minority. Where there is a two-party system, and those in one party range in their political views from one extreme to the other, and those in the other party, which is the majority party, we will say, also represent a wide range of thought, it is much better to have people working in the party, follow the platform of the party, so that there can be party responsibility, than it is to have them broken down into various splinters and have them become independent, and, therefore, have no party responsibility whatever. I say that if the desire is to increase the Socialist vote in America, or to have the Socialist Party become a strong party, or if the desire is to have the Communists become a strong party, and not be trying to infiltrate into the other parties, the kind of proportional representation proposed by the joint resolution would bring about such a condition.

Mr. LODGE. There is no Senator here who is less anxious to build up the Socialist Party or the Communist Party than is the junior Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. FERGUSON. I realize that.

Mr. LODGE. It is precisely for that reason that I am one of those proposing this amendment to the Constitution, because I think such a constitutional amendment would enhance and invigorate the two-party system, and reduce the influence of splinter parties, which in the last election threw the whole State of New York to Mr. Dewey, although he did not have a majority of the popular vote. But I shall debate that later.

Mr. FERGUSON. I can understand why the Senator feels that Mr. Dewey, for example, not having a majority of the popular vote, should not have had the electoral votes of New York. I can understand that, but cannot agree with it.

Mr. LODGE. I am not objecting to Mr. Dewey getting any votes. I am objecting to Henry Wallace having as much influence as he had in the last election, and I contend that the proposed system would cut him right down to size.

Mr. FERGUSON. I believe that Mr. Wallace would have become a permanent fixture in the United States, so far as elections were concerned, if the proposed system had been in effect.

Mr. LODGE. I think he would have evaporated much more quickly if the proposed system had been in effect, because in that campaign his ability to determine the outcome gave him his power and influence, and the pending proposal would reduce the power and influence of any third party.

Mr. FERGUSON. I feel just the opposite would be the result.

Mr. LODGE. I should like to ask the Senator a question about the amendment he proposes. Does not his amendment write the all-or-nothing-rule system into the Constitution, where it now does not exist?

Mr. FERGUSON. Yes; that is correct.

Mr. LODGE. Would not that change the State election laws? I heard the Senator objecting to changing State election laws. Would not that amendment require a tremendous change in State elections laws?

Mr. FERGUSON. No.

Mr. LODGE. It seems to me that if that were in the Constitution, the States would have to change their election laws to conform with the unit-rule system, which is not now in the Constitution.

Mr. FERGUSON. But it is the practice, the unit rule has been the practice.

Mr. LODGE. But it is not in the Constitution.

Mr. FERGUSON. No.

Mr. LODGE. If the Senator is so solicitous about not requiring the States to change their laws, I should think he would not make a proposal such as he has suggested, which would impose an additional Federal obligation on the States.

Mr. FERGUSON. I do not understand that it would require any change in State laws. It has been the system, proven in practice.

Mr. LODGE. The practice.

Mr. FERGUSON. It has been the practice, and it therefore involves no unforeseeable consequences.

Mr. LODGE. The Senator's amendment provides that Congress, voting individually, would settle elections in which no candidate received a majority.

Mr. FERGUSON. That is correct.

Mr. LODGE. Would the Senator have the Members of Congress pledged?

Mr. FERGUSON. No.

Mr. LODGE. Would they vote their own personal ideas?

Mr. FERGUSON. There would undoubtedly be a plank in the platform of the Republican Party, or the Democratic Party, or of whatever party to which the Members of Congress belonged, that they would vote, if ever required to vote in the Senate and the House in a joint session, for the President nominated on the particular ticket upon which they were elected.

Mr. LODGE. So that if a Democratic President and a Republican Congress were elected in the same election, then the Senator would have the Republican Congress choosing a Republican, although he had not received as many votes as the other candidate.

Mr. FERGUSON. Yes; and I think that would be a good thing, because the people would have spoken, through their respective districts, and in case of a minority and not a majority, the Congress would name the President, because that would represent the popular vote.

Mr. LODGE. But the same voters will often vote for the candidate of one party for President, for the candidate of another party for Senator, and if a Senator were given the right to vote as he desired, that would be running exactly counter to what the citizen might want, taking the whole presidential election away from him, setting up a new body to decide presidential elections, completely removed from the popular will.

Mr. FERGUSON. I merely wish to say that those who vote for a different candidate for President than the one for whom they vote to be Senator they do not understand the American system of Government. It is no reflection upon them, but they do not understand they are confusing any prospect for action on issues.

Mr. LODGE. There are many Senators on this floor—of whom I happen to be one, and I daresay the Senator from Michigan is another—who were elected to the Senate at the same election when a Democratic President was also being elected, and I shall never admit that the people who elected me did not understand the American system.

Mr. FERGUSON. The Senator from Michigan was not elected in the State of Michigan when a Democratic President was elected, but that is beside the point.

Mr. LODGE. The Senator from Massachusetts was elected by the voters of Massachusetts in 1936, when a Democratic President was being elected, and it seemed to the Senator from Massachusetts, and apparently seemed to a plurality of the voters in Massachusetts, that that was a perfectly American and a perfectly consistent thing to do.

Mr. FERGUSON. Does not the Senator also think that the people really intended to elect a Republican, and that they wanted him in the Congress?

Mr. LODGE. They intended to elect a Democratic President. Franklin D. Roosevelt carried the State, according to my recollection, by 170,000, whereas I carried it by 140,000. There were 310,000 people who voted for a Democratic President and a Republican Senator. Why is not that perfectly American?

Mr. FERGUSON. It is perfectly all right, if that State desires a Republican Senator and a Democratic President. That is perfectly all right.

Mr. LODGE. Under the Senator's amendment, if the Congress settled the result of the presidential election, there would be a Republican Senator bound by the Senator's own system to vote for a Republican candidate for President, even though the people had voted the other way.

Mr. MALONE. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Massachusetts a question.

Mr. LODGE. I shall be glad to reply.

Mr. MALONE. As I understand the system the Senator has advocated under his joint resolution, it would take away any possibility of a State voting as a unit. In other words, the electors who vote for a Democratic President or a Republican President join with the electors of other States to make up the majority or the minority, whatever it may happen to be, for the respective person for whom they vote. In other words, there would be no such thing, from then on, as a State voting as a body for a President.

Mr. LODGE. If the people of a State vote unanimously for a certain candidate for President, that candidate gets all the electoral votes of the State. But if 80 percent vote for one candidate and 20 percent vote for another, then candidate A gets 80 percent of the electoral vote and candidate B gets 20 percent of the electoral vote.

Mr. MALONE. I was merely seeking to call attention to what the Senator had in his mind when he introduced this principle. Of course, when we elect the governor of a State, or elect a Senator or a Representative, he is elected by a majority of the people of a State.

Mr. LODGE. Usually a plurality. Election by a plurality is the usual rule in American electors for Senators, Governors, mayors, and most other officers.

Mr. MALONE. Of course, choice by majority is the rule.

Mr. LODGE. No; choice by plurality is the rule.

Mr. MALONE. Sometimes there are three candidates for governor in a State, but where there are two, as there usually are, a Democratic and a Republican candidate, the one who gets the largest number of votes is elected.

Mr. LODGE. That would be true in any system when there are simply two candidates. In such case there is certain to be a majority for one candidate. It is when there are three or more candidates that there begin to be pluralities.

Mr. MALONE. That is true. What I intended to have the Senator from Massachusetts clarify, but we were slightly diverted from it is the point that adoption of the amendment would take away from the State the opportunity of expressing itself as a State through a majority.

Mr. LODGE. No. The State would express itself if a majority of the voters of the State voted a certain way. That fact would receive accurate expression in the electoral vote. But the unit rule is done away with. That is correct. If the State has 10 electoral votes, and 60 percent of the vote of the State were to go to candidate A and 40 percent to candidate B, then candidate A would receive 6 electoral votes and candidate B would receive 4 electoral votes. All 10 would not go to candidate A.

Mr. MALONE. Then the first statement the Junior Senator from Massachusetts made is not correct. The last statement is correct. The last statement is that if there are two candidates for President, and one of them receives 30 percent of the vote, we will say, that percentage of the vote is counted for him.

Mr. LODGE. Yes.

Mr. MALONE. And there is no such thing as unanimity in a State's vote for President.

Mr. LODGE. The unit rule of all or nothing is done away with; that is correct unless, of course, the voters of a State cast their ballots unanimously for one candidate.

INVOCATION OF EMERGENCY PROVISIONS OF LABOR-MANAGEMENT RELATIONS ACT

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, John L. Lewis is playing with the President and the American people as a cat plays with a mouse. One day he pounces upon us and allows no soft-coal production at all. The next day he releases his grasp slightly and allows limited production to trickle through. Then he pounces again with all fours.

By these tactics he is menacing the general welfare of the American people in the dead of winter. The national emergency which he has precipitated may be summed up by the following facts:

The normal over-all coal supply above the ground is 50,000,000 tons.

The supply above the ground today is about 20,000,000 tons.

In the most recent 2 weeks' period Lewis has allowed the production of 12,500,000 tons.

In the same period consumption has totaled 22,500,000 tons.

Consumption is outrunning production at the rate of a net loss of from 500,000 to 700,000 tons a day.

At the present rate of production and consumption all reserves would be consumed in about a month.

While the over-all reserves, if equally distributed, would be enough to last for a month, assuming the present rate of production, they would last about 2 weeks if production should be completely stopped. Yet, the reserve in the hands of the retailers is only about 1,000,000 tons and, if equally distributed, would supply the country for 2½ days. With cold weather now forecast throughout the East as well as the North and West, we may easily have a critical situation in a period of hours.

Such reserves as remain are so scattered that human suffering will be extensive long before the reserves are completely exhausted.

The Interstate Commerce Commission on December 23 found, as a result of the coal shortage, that the ability of the railroads to perform their service and duties in the interest of the public and the commerce of the people is seriously threatened.

Subsequently, on January 4, the Interstate Commerce Commission found that an emergency exists requiring immediate action—with respect to curtailment of railroad operations—in all sections of the country.

This curtailment of rail transportation has already affected the dispatch of the United States mail.

It is obvious to all that if the Lewis tactics are allowed to continue steam operations on railroads, other vital industries, power plants, and so forth, will be brought to a virtual standstill within a relatively few days.

The shortage of fuel in the worst of the winter months would extend to the homes and domestic routines of millions of families, and the shortage of fuel and power will extend even to hospitals and other institutions vital not only to the general welfare but literally to the health of the Nation as well.

The existence of an emergency has been recognized by National Labor Relations Board Counsel Denham, who has proceeded in the only way he could by requesting the court action in the situation from the standpoint that Lewis is engaging in an unfair labor practice.

Denham is to be commended for the courage he displayed in the absence of any manifest interest by the President. But even if his move is a proper one under the law, it is likely the suffering will be deadly before action can be taken under the ordinarily slow processes of Federal courts.

In the face of all this, the President has said no emergency exists, and still stubbornly refuses to take the immediate action that only the President can take.

Director of the Bureau of Mines, Dr. James Boyd, differs with the President as to whether an emergency in coal exists. In testifying before the Senate Labor Committee on January 25, Dr. Boyd said:

> Unless there is an immediate resumption of substantially increased coal production the national economy, health, and welfare is now or soon will be imperiled.

Under the circumstances, to delay declaration of a national emergency until the last lump of coal is burned might be politically expedient, but humanely it certainly would be an anticlimax.

Something has changed the mind of the President about when an emergency in coal shortage exists.

In an Executive order of March 23, 1948, issued by the President as a result of a Lewis strike, the President found that it was "affecting a substantial part of an industry engaged in trade and commerce among the several States and with foreign nations, and in the production of goods and commerce, which strike, if permitted to continue, will imperil the national health and safety."

That is what Mr. Truman said on March 23, 1948.

When the President made that finding there were 45,000,000 tons of coal above the ground. Now there are little more than 20,000,000 tons. Then he set up a commission to determine the facts preliminary to action under the national-emergency provisions of the Taft-Hartley Act. Today no commission has been established and the President has said he did not think anything was needed.

On April 3, 1948, the commission confirmed the President's views, the President ordered the Attorney General to seek an injunction to stop the strike, and the injunction was granted—all in the same day. That is how serious the emergency was at that time. On that day in April 1948, when the worst of the winter was over, there were 40,000,000 tons of coal above ground. Today, with the worst of the winter ahead, there is little more than 20,000,000 tons above the ground.

Despite the statement attributed to the President that he had never used the Taft-Hartley Act, an official compilation by the Library of Congress shows that he has invoked the act on seven different occasions, as follows:

First. Atomic energy dispute, March 1948.

Second. Meat-packers dispute, March 1948.

Third. First bituminous-coal dispute, March 1948.

Fourth. Long-line-telephone dispute, May 1948.

Fifth. Maritime dispute, June 1948.

Sixth. Second bituminous-coal dispute, June 1948.

Seventh. Longshoremen's dispute, August 1948.

Perhaps the President was erroneously quoted. Perhaps the statement was inadvertent. But, in any event, the fact that he has not used the Taft-Hartley Act since August 1948 is significant.

Whether or not it is due to some secret election campaign agreement with labor leaders, implied or otherwise, it is a fact that the President has not invoked the Taft-Hartley Act since his active campaigning for reelection in 1948 really started.

Under our constitutional form of government, the Congress makes the laws and the President must execute them, and any President who refuses to enforce the law as enacted by Congress is undermining the constitutional processes of our Government.

The Taft-Hartley Act imposes upon the President the constitutional duty of invoking the national emergency provisions of that law when he finds there is a national emergency.

It is a matter of record that responsible agencies and officials of the Government have officially found that a national emergency has arisen by virtue of the intolerable behavior of one labor leader who has time and time again set himself above the Government of the United States.

Everybody in the country except the President and the labor leaders knows that a national emergency exists.

The Supreme Court of the land has upheld the action taken as a result of the President's previous invocation of the Taft-Hartley Act against Lewis.

Under the circumstances, I am submitting a resolution stating officially that the Senate of the United States knows an emergency exists, and that it is calling upon the President to perform his constitutional duty in behalf of the people of the Nation.

This is a Senate resolution, which, under the rules of the Senate, I request to lie on the table. This means that the Senate, by a majority vote, can take up such a resolution for consideration. The fact that action on the joint resolution recently introduced by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. TAFT] and other Senators, for the purpose of declaring that an emergency in the coal supply exists was indefinitely postponed by the Labor Committee, warrants the submission of a Senate resolution, which can be taken up quickly without reference to committee.

The adoption by the Senate of a resolution that an emergency does exist, while without legal effect, will have a profound influence as expressing the majority sentiment and judgment of the Members of the United States Senate.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to submit the resolution, which I ask to be printed and lie on the table, and to be printed in the body of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the resolution (S. Res. 221) was received and ordered to lie on the table, as follows:

> Whereas the President of the United States on March 23, 1948, signed Executive Order 9939 creating an emergency board under the Labor-Management Relations Act,

1947, in connection with the strike in the bituminous coal-mining industry taking place at that time; and

Whereas stocks of bituminous coal as of March 23, 1948, were approximately 45,000,000 tons of coal based on official Bureau of Mines figures, representing approximately 31 days' forward supply; and

Whereas stocks of bituminous coal today are approximately 20,000,000 tons based on best available Bureau of Mines figures, representing only a few days forward supply; and

Whereas the present serious shortage of bituminous coal has already been recognized by public bodies, including the Interstate Commerce Commission, which has restricted coal-burning passenger service locomotive mileage by 33⅓ percent; and

Whereas Dr. James Boyd, Director, Bureau of Mines, United States Department of the Interior, nearly a week ago, on January 25, 1950, testifying before the Senate Committee on Labor and Public Welfare, said: "Unless there is an immediate resumption of substantially increased coal production the national economy, health, and welfare is now or soon will be imperiled"; and

Whereas the President has effectively invoked the national emergency provisions of the Labor-Management Relations Act, 1947, in seven instances as follows: Atomic energy dispute, March 1948; meat packers dispute, March 1948; first bituminous-coal dispute, March 1948; long-line telephone dispute, May 1948; maritime dispute, June 1948; second bituminous-coal dispute, June 1948; and longshoremen's dispute, August 1948: Therefore be it

Resolved, That it is the sense of the Senate that the President of the United States shall invoke the national-emergency provisions (secs. 206–210, inclusive) of the Labor-Management Relations Act, 1947, in the current strike in the coal industry.

STATEMENT BY SENATOR MORSE ON THE EQUAL-RIGHTS AMENDMENT

Mr. SMITH of New Jersey obtained the floor.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me for 1 or 2 minutes so I may make a brief statement, and ask to have several insertions made in the RECORD?

Mr. SMITH of New Jersey. I am glad to yield to the Senator from Oregon.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, since the Senate has acted on the joint resolution proposing the so-called equal-rights amendment to the Constitution, I do not wish to take the time of the Senate to discuss the subject now, but I do wish to make clear that, while entertaining doubts regarding the legal effect of the proposal, nevertheless, I favor submitting it to the State legislatures for consideration.

Mr. President, I was absent from the Senate on official business last Wednesday, January 25, when the vote was taken on Senate Joint Resolution 25, the resolution proposing a constitutional amendment declaring that "equality of rights under the law shall not be denied or abridged on account of sex." If present, however, I would have voted in favor of submitting the proposed amendment to the States, in view of the fact that both party platforms have declared in favor of that step and in view of the rejection of the substitute measure, proposing a commission to study and report on the nature and extent of discriminations based on sex and declaring it to be the national policy that there should be no distinctions based on sex "except such as are reasonably justified by differences in physical structure, or by maternal function."

Eminent jurists and lawyers have raised serious questions about the amendment. Thus, a group of them, including deans and professors of law of 21 leading law schools, has endorsed a statement which in part reads as follows:

If anything about this proposed amendment is clear, it is that it would transform every provision of law concerning women into a constitutional issue to be ultimately resolved by the Supreme Court of the United States. Every statutory and common-law provision dealing with the manifold relation of women in society would be forced to run the gauntlet of attack on constitutional grounds. The range of such potential litigation is too great to be readily foreseen, but it would certainly embrace such diverse legal provisions as those relating to a widow's allowance, the obligation of family support and grounds for divorce, the age of majority, and the right of annulment of marriages, and the maximum hours of labor for women in protected industries.

Not only is the range of the amendment of indefinite extent but, even more important, the fate of all this varied legislation would be left highly uncertain in the face of judicial review. Presumably the amendment would set up a constitutional yardstick of absolute equality between men and women in all legal relationships. A more flexible view, permitting reasonable differentiation, can hardly be regarded as the object of the proposal, since the fourteenth amendment has long provided that no State shall deny to any person the equal protection of the laws, and that amendment permits reasonable classifications while prohibiting arbitrary legal discrimination. If it were intended to give the courts the authority to pass upon the propriety of distinctions, benefits, and duties as between men and women, no new guidance is given to the courts, and this entire subject, one of unusual complexity, would be left to the unpredictable judgments of courts in the form of constitutional decisions.

This statement, after briefly examining the impact of the amendment, concludes that:

The basic fallacy in the proposed amendment is that it attempts to deal with complicated and highly concrete problems arising out of a diversity of human relationships in terms of a single and simple abstraction. This abstraction is undoubtedly a worthy ideal for mobilizing legislative forces in order to remedy particular deficiencies in the law. But as a constitutional standard, it is hopelessly inept. That the proposed equal-rights amendment would open up an era of regrettable consequences for the legal status of women in this country is highly probable. That it would open up a period of extreme confusion in constitutional law is a certainty.

Because of these serious legal questions, it seemed to me that the next logical step in the struggle to eliminate outmoded, unfair, and unnecessary discriminations based on sex was to conduct a detailed study, on the basis of which the Congress and the legislatures of the States could take informed action. For that reason, I joined in sponsoring in this Congress the so-called status bill, Senate bill 1430, the substance of which was offered but rejected as a substitute for Senate Joint Resolution 25.

The Senate adopted the amendment offered by the senior Senator from Arizona [Mr. HAYDEN], providing that "rights, benefits, or exemptions now or hereafter conferred by law upon persons of the female sex" shall not be impaired by reason of the earlier declaration in the amendment that equality of rights under the law shall not be denied or abridged on account of sex. I felt that these two propositions were, in large part, contradictory; and therefore I recorded my position against the so-called Hayden amendment.

An editorial in the Washington Post for Sunday, January 29, sums up the matter thus:

EQUAL RIGHTS

Although the Senate has approved the proposed constitutional amendment to give women equality of rights under the law, the vote was far from a victory for the advocates of the equal-rights amendment. On the contrary, it was a qualified victory for the many outstanding women's organizations that have made a splendid fight against it. For by amending the proposed constitutional amendment so as not to impair any rights, benefits, or exemptions conferred by law upon persons of the female sex, the Senate has made it comparatively innocuous and rather meaningless. At the same time it has alienated those forthright supporters of the original amendment who want to sweep away all laws intended for the protection of the weaker sex and put women on a basis of absolute equality with men under the law. Since the amendment in its present form is unacceptable to many of the equal-rights advocates, and since the amendment in any form would antagonize many of the States, we conclude that the chances of its eventual ratification are negligible.

As we have repeatedly pointed out, and as Senator LEHMAN said in course of the debate on the pending amendment, discrimination against women growing out of prejudice or custom can never be abolished by constitutional mandate. Moreover, attempts to compel the States to modify discriminatory laws would create endless litigation and legal confusion. That is why we have favored passage of the women's status bill, which declares that the policy of the Federal Government shall be to abolish distinctions based on sex, except such as are reasonably justified by differences in physical structure or by maternal function. That bill also calls for a presidential commission to study the problem and make recommendations for any required changes in Federal and State laws. The States would remain free to accept or reject such recommendations, but in our opinion that would be much more amenable to suggestions than to efforts to compel compliance with a constitutional mandate affording no practicable guide to purposive action.

We hope that the fight for the equal-status bill will be carried on with increased vigor. For it provides a practicable and reasonable method of dealing with the problem of legal discrimination without jeopardizing the efficacy of protective social and economic legislation essential for the protection of women in industry and in the home.

Mr. President, in closing let me say that it is my hope that the States, if the House should join in Senate Joint Resolution 25, will carefuly study the probable effect of the amendment. As an aid to that consideration, I believe it would be wise to enact Senate bill 1430, the status bill, so that the Congress and the States may be fully informed on this subject.

I thank my good friend, the Senator from New Jersey, for permitting me to make this statement at this time.

PROPOSED CHANGE IN METHOD OF ELECTION OF PRESIDENT AND VICE PRESIDENT

The Senate resumed the consideration of the resolution (S. J. Res. 2) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States providing for the election of President and Vice President.

Mr. SMITH of New Jersey. Mr. President, I propose to resume the discussion of the unfinished business, Senate Joint Resolution 2, the joint resolution proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States relative to the election of President and Vice President.

Mr. President, this subject is a very important one. The issues presented in this debate have confronted the United States ever since the time of its founding and the establishment of its method of electing a President and Vice President through the use of the electoral college.

When the time comes to vote on the amendment under our constitutional processes, I wish it were possible for all the people of the country to have the benefit of the splendid presentation made to the Senate by our distinguished colleague the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] when he opened this debate, and also to have the benefit of the splendid presentation on the other side of the question made by our colleague the Senator from Michigan [Mr. FERGUSON].

In connection with the effort to solve these problems, no one would presume to state dogmatically what would happen under a given set of circumstances. Inevitably, if we are suggesting a change in the process of electing the President and Vice President of the United States, we shall differ in our views in regard to what will be the effect of the proposed change, and no one can be sure exactly how the people will react to the proposals if put into effect.

But, Mr. President, I shall try to present an orderly statement of what I feel is the main issue in this matter, which has brought me to the conclusion that I should support Senate Joint Resolution 2.

Mr. President, the able Senator from Massachusetts already has stated his reasons for introducing the pending joint resolution. He has done so in an admirable and comprehensive statement, based upon years of intensive study—and in that connection I emphasize the word "years."

I may say, Mr. President, that I have been connected with Princeton University for some time, and the subject now before us has been considered by the university's department of politics. Although there are differing views, I think I am safe in saying that at least those in our institution who have studied this matter feel that this is the most practical approach which has been suggested in a great many years in regard to improving what we feel are the deficiencies in our present use of the electoral college.

I also call attention to the fact, as the RECORD shows, and as the Senator from Massachusetts pointed out, that the Brookings Institution, which is a research institution, as all of us know, came to a similar conclusion, and felt that the pending proposal was the best practical suggestion which had been made for improving some of the defects in our present system.

So I have no apologies to make for supporting the joint resolution, although I give great credit to, and have great respect for, the judgment of such distinguished colleagues of mine as the Senator from Michigan, who has just made such an able presentation.

Mr. President, without going into great detail myself, I simply wish to indicate why I have become an enthusiastic cosponsor of this measure, and I should like to emphasize certain aspects of it which seem to me to be of overriding importance.

I wish to say here that the Senator from Michigan seems to be concerned that the adoption of this new procedure will break down our two-party system. I say without reservation that if I thought there were any danger of that; I would be opposed to the joint resolution. I think that nothing in the United States of America is more important than our two-party system.

Our present system of presidential elections is based partly on the Constitution and partly on a great historical development which took place outside the Constitution, namely, the rise of the American two-party system. I shall try to indicate that I believe the proposed constitutional amendment will strengthen, not weaken, the two-party system.

It is well known that the two-party system was entirely unforeseen by the founding fathers; indeed, Washington and others of our early leaders repeatedly warned against what they considered the baneful growth of factions in the body politic. Washington even went so far as to be afraid of a two-party system; but, above all, he did not want factions in the body politic. Nevertheless, our young Republic was immediately faced with the practical problem of organizing our political activity in such a way as to give expression to conflicting interests without allowing those interests to throw us into a state of anarchy. The practical solution which we found to this problem was the great two-party system, which we have had almost throughout our history, and which we still cherish today.

Mr. President, this two-party system, which grew up within the broad terms of our Constitution, is an essential part of our priceless American heritage of freedom. As we have progressed from a limited suffrage to our present principle of universal adult suffrage, this system has afforded us a mechanism through which every citizen can express his voice—let me emphasize that point—and can exert his personal weight and influence, in a practical way, on the public affairs of his community, his State, and his Nation. It has meant that a channel was always open, through the minority party, for the free and effective expression of opposition. The two-party system is the heart of the organization of our democratic process.

Yet there is one respect in which the practices of this system have tended to nullify the system itself. I refer to the unit rule, under which all the electoral votes of each State are awarded to the Presidential candidate winning a plurality of the votes in the State. In my opinion, the abolition of this unit rule is the outstanding merit of the constitutional amendment proposed by Senate Joint Resolution 2.

Of course, I should point out that the distinguished Senator from Michigan takes issue at that point. That is the one thing the Senator from Michigan does not want to see happen, namely, the abolition of the unit rule.

It is not difficult to understand how the unit rule came into being. Political parties, like businesses, are in competition with each other. We all know how in industry, competition often tends to destroy itself, as one contending party succeeds in establishing a monopoly. We have long recognized that monopolistic practices are contrary to the public interest, and we have developed antitrust laws to hold them in check.

The unit rule in presidential elections is essentially a monopolistic rule. Our parties early discovered the convenience of offering in each State a single slate of electors, pledged to vote in the electoral college for the party's presidential candidate. Under this system, the whole party slate either wins or loses, and the electoral vote of the whole State goes to either one candidate or the other; it is never divided between the candidates, no matter how close the popular vote for President in the State may be.

The result is that in any State where one party holds a clear and certain majority, this rule completely nullifies the party contest for the Presidency. It creates a presidential monopoly for the majority party in that State. So in all the States—some of them predominantly Republican, some of them predominantly Democratic—the competitive two-party system has virtually ceased to exist.

The Senator from Massachusetts has already ably indicated the evil effects of this situation. He has stressed the stay-at-home attitude of voters in the safe States, who know very well that the Presidential election result is a foregone conclusion which their votes cannot change. He has noted that party activity during Presidential campaigns in these States is practically nil. He has noted that the Presidential candidates themselves are never nominated from these States and never bother to visit them during campaigns. The picture in these States is one of complete apathy and indifference. The people of these safe States stand completely outside the process of electing a President, although the President represents them as well as all the other people of the country. They are fast becoming what may be called political backwashes, areas of political stagnation. I submit that in this age, when democracy is at stake throughout the world, such a development is profoundly serious. Let me note in passing, it is my judgment that this situation has much to do with the small percentage of votes in relation to the number of those eligible to vote. We found in elections over a number of years that that was true. In the elections of 1948, 90,000,000 people were eligible to vote, only 45,000,000 of whom actually voted. The actual percentage was something like 49.5 of the total number of people eligible to vote. In my judgment, that is partly due to the fact that we have the division of so-called safe States, States in which people think their votes will not make any difference. It is my feeling that Senate Joint Resolution 2 proposes an amendment which goes directly to the heart of this evil. Just as our antitrust laws recognize that the people cannot afford to tolerate the economic stagnation of business monopolies, so this amendment would recognize that our free American people cannot afford the political stagnation of party monopolies in any of our States. It would open up the whole length and breadth of the United States to the healthy competition of our two great political parties. No longer would it be possible for a safe State to deliver its due number of electoral votes to one Presidential candidate without a single important campaign speech in favor of either candidate having been made in that State. No longer would a Presidential election day come and go in these States without causing even a ripple of interest among the voters. Even if the strength of the minority party in such a State were only 10 percent, that 10 percent would be worth contending for because it would be reflected in the final outcome. Our Presidential campaigns, instead of being concentrated in a few pivotal States, would be spread throughout the country, turning areas of stagnation into areas of real vitality.

We all know as a practical matter—and I served on the Republican National Committee for a time, so I know the practical side of this question—that before an election, we think in terms of States which are the ones in which it is most worth while to put forth our efforts. There are certain States we cannot get, anyway, so why waste time and money on them? Consequently, the people of those States are left out of the picture so far as active interest in the campaign is concerned, and it is little wonder they do not go to the polls.

I feel so strongly on the question of a larger percentage of our people voting in elections that I have even considered the possibility of exploring legislation which has been enacted in certain countries, of which I think Australia is one, where either an incentive to vote is provided by law, or a penalty for not voting is provided by law. I merely say in passing, if I am correct in my figures, Australia has raised its percentage of people voting from somewhere in the low fifties to between 85 and 90 percent, since the enactment of the law, and the people of Australia feel that they have improved the democratic processes.

But let me emphasize that the abolition of the unit rule would improve our electoral process not only in the so-called sure States, but in every State of the Union. The inequities of the present system are well known. It entirely fails to register minority sentiment in any State, and instead gives the leading candidate the votes not only of his own supporters but of his opponents as well. That is the effect of the present system. It enables third parties, by turning the balance of power in close States, to exercise an influence out of all proportion to their strength, and even to decide the outcome of the election. My friend, the Senator from Michigan, made the point that we would probably be giving incentives to third parties and fourth parties and other minority groups to come forward and make trouble. I feel that under the present system minorities become strong enough in pivotal States frequently to swing an election, when they should not have that exaggerated power. And this distortion of the will of the people confronts us with the danger of electing a minority President who received fewer popular votes than his opponent.

There is not a doubt in my mind that a system containing all these inequities and dangers should be changed. But the question remains whether the pending measure which I am supporting offers the best solution.

There are some—notably the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. LANGER], and the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. HUMPHREY] has also offered an amendment on the subject—who suggest that the best cure is to go all the way to election of the President and Vice President by direct popular vote. This solution would eliminate not only the electoral college and the unit rule, but the whole system of electoral votes as well. I do not share the view that that is the proper approach.

Direct popular election of the President is an appealing idea from a theoretical point of view, but I cannot accept it because I believe it does unnecessary violence to the Constitution. The electoral votes of each State correspond exactly to the State's representation in the two Houses of Congress. Since this includes two Senators regardless of population, the effect is to give a disproportionate strength to the less populous States. But, Mr. President, this effect was the deliberate intention of the framers of the Constitution, who wanted a truly Federal Constitution. It seems directly from the great compromise by which all the States were given equal representation in the Senate. It was this compromise which actually saved the Federal Convention of 1787 and made possible the adoption of the Constitution. Without it, quite possibly we would never have become a single nation. I therefore suggest that it is the part of wisdom and also the part of sound principle under our Federal system, to leave this traditional principle intact. I agree therefore with the distinguished Senator from Michigan in his emphasis on that particular point. I think he is entirely correct; it would be a mistake to move over into the direct election of Presidents, ignoring the State break-down.

The pending measure wisely does just that. It preserves the principle of electoral votes, and in so doing I think it faithfully preserves the spirit of our fundamental law. In fact, this measure does not acutally propose to abrogate any important provision of the Constitution as it is now written. It would, to be sure, do away with two relatively minor provisions, both of which are, as the Senator from Massachusetts has shown potentially very dangerous, namely, the rubber-stamp electoral college—and who does no know that our electoral college is merely a rubber stamp?—and the illogical provision for election of the President and Vice President by Congress where no candidate receives a majority of the electoral vote. Heaven forbid that we should ever have to have an election by Congress under the system now prevailing.

But the most important effect of the abolition of the unit rule is that it strikes not at the Constitution itself but at a political practice sanctified only by habit. In what we do today, we are not dealing with constitutional principle. Under present laws we are perpetuating a practice which nullifies and frustrates the working of our great two-party system, because, as I have tried to point out, it simply puts some of our States into an area of political stagnation. Thus I think it is accurate to say that Senate Joint Resolution 2 proposes to spell out, in terms of modern actuality, a procedure on which the framers of the Constitution had nothing to say because in their time our party system was unknown and unforeseen. We are dealing with something which has grown up since the Constitution was first framed.

Some may ask whether the proposed amendment, if ratified, would benefit the Democrats or the Republicans. Fortunately, Mr. President, I do not think any of us has sufficient prophetic powers to answer that question with any confidence.

The Senator from Michigan in his able address said that those of us who are proponents of the resolution were speculating as to what might happen under certain conditions. I return the answer to the Senator by asking whether he was not speculating in his address as to what might happen in the way of the dire effects he predicted with respect to minority groups. For my part I feel that this is no time for the close calculation of party advantage. I agree wholeheartedly with the observation of the Senator from Massachusetts, in his opening address, when he said: "Our parties exist to serve the people and have no other excuse for being."

Therefore I suggest that, in considering the pending measure, it is our duty to ask ourselves—not "Is it good for the Democrats?" or "Is it good for the Republicans?" but "Is it good for the American people?" For the reasons I have stated, I believe the answer is "Yes". In my judgment the proposed amendment would be a major step in releasing the pent-up vitality of our American democracy.

Mr. President, I sincerely hope the Senate will pass the joint resolution by an overwhelming vote.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Jersey yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. SMITH of New Jersey. I yield.

Mr. LUCAS. The distinguished Senator has been discussing minority representation under the amendment, suggesting that a candidate with but very few votes compared to the majority number of votes cast might become President.

I should like, respectfully, to ask the Senator a question.

Mr. SMITH of New Jersey. If the distinguished Senator will pardon me, I am not quite clear what he meant by his statement. I was not suggesting that a candidate who received very few votes could become President. My own guess is it would never happen, if our parties were alive and on the job. I do not think a minority candidate could grab the Presidency under any conceivable set of circumstances.

Mr. LUCAS. Perhaps I misunderstood the Senator's statement. As I recall, he was objecting to the argument advanced by the distinguished Senator from Michigan along that line. In other words, if I followed the Senator correctly, it was the Senator from Michigan who said "splinter" parties might be developed throughout the country. Under the proposed amendment I can envision a case, where, for example, 26 percent of the vote of the people might elect a President. Does the Senator agree with me about that?

Mr. SMITH of New Jersey. It is mathematically possible, and it would be a challenge to the organization of further parties.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HOLLAND in the chair). Does the Senator from New Jersey yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. SMITH of New Jersey. I yield.

Mr. LODGE. It is not only mathematically possible, but it would be practically possible under the present system. It has happened 12 times.

Mr. LUCAS. The Senator may be correct about that. But what I wanted to ask the Senator was whether or not he is familiar with the amendment offered by the able Senator from South Carolina [Mr. JOHNSTON] which provides:

> The person having the greatest number of electoral votes for President shall be the President, if such number be at least 40 percent of the whole number of electoral votes; and if no person have at least 40 percent of the whole number of electoral votes, then from the persons having the highest numbers not exceeding three on the list of those voted for as President, the House of Representatives shall choose immediately, by ballot, the President.

It seems to me that amendment may have some merit, in answer to the argument made by the Senator from Michigan and I was wondering whether the Senator from New Jersey had considered it or whether the Senator from Massachusetts had considered it.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, will the Senator from New Jersey permit me to comment on that?

Mr. SMITH of New Jersey. I yield to the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. LODGE. I would be opposed to the amendment offered by the Senator from South Carolina, for two reasons, first, that it would continue the almost universally condemned method of having the House of Representatives voting for a President, with each State casting one vote.

Mr. LUCAS. I also object to that. I am dealing only with the 40-percent provision. I think the resolution offered by the Senator from Massachusetts is much better, so far as the proper representation is concerned. I was only questioning the argument made by the Senator from Michigan with respect to splinter parties which might arise. It seemed to me, as I read the Johnston amendment, that it might have some merit in curing that defect.

Mr. LODGE. If I may, I should like to complete my comment.

Mr. SMITH of New Jersey. I yield to the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. LODGE. Under our present system, it is possible for the person receiving less than a majority of the votes to be elected. It has happened in the cases of Presidents Polk, Taylor, Buchanan, Lincoln, Hayes, Garfield, Cleveland, Harrison, Wilson, and Truman.

There has never been any complaint, and no one has ever been able to point to any harm which has come from the fact that Abraham Lincoln was elected with 39 percent of the votes. It seems to me that the amendment offered by the Senator from South Carolina addresses itself to something which Senate joint resolution 2 leaves entirely alone. Under our present system a President might be elected by less than a majority of the votes, and under the proposed joint resolution that could still occur. There is nothing inherently wrong about that. Senate Joint Resolution 2 does not essentially change the present system insofar as plurality of the popular vote is concerned.

Mr. LUCAS. I do not think I quite agree with my friend from Massachusetts. I think if the joint resolution should become law it would encourage minority parties. Henry Wallace ran for the Presidency of the United States last year. Under this proposed resolution he would have received a number of electoral votes, because of the considerable popular vote he received. On the other hand, he received, under our present system, no electoral votes whatsoever. It is not very much encouragement to a splinter party to continue if it does not receive any electoral votes. A number of persons may look for an opportunity to say, "I ran for the Presidency and received one electoral vote. I want to pass that information down to the family to show that I was a candidate for the Presidency at one time, and that I did receive a vote for the Presidency of the United States." I think it would encourage splinter parties, which I do not particularly like, in view of what I know about them in some other areas of the world.

Mr. SMITH of New Jersey. I should like to say to the Senator from Illinois that if I thought that would be the result, I would be in grave doubt; but I do not think it will be the result. I agree that some persons like headlines, but I do not think we are going to be faced with that situation.

Mr. LUCAS. Everyone has been speculating about what is going to happen, and I thought I would put in my two bits worth.

Mr. FERGUSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SMITH of New Jersey. I yield to the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. FERGUSON. In 1934 the late Senator Norris sponsored a similar resolution containing a provision for 35 percent of the vote; in other words, that a candidate had to receive at least 35 percent of the vote. The Johnston amendment provides for 40 percent of the vote.

But I think the distinguished Senator from Illinois has hit the nail on the head. Everyone is speculating; and when we have to speculate we should not amend the Constitution to provide for a great contingency such as that which is being provided for here. We should be more sure of the outcome. We are now speculating about changing the habits of voters.

Mr. SMITH of New Jersey. I should like to say, in answer to the distinguished Senator from Michigan, that if we take that position I cannot see any possibility of ever making any change whatsoever, because any proposed change will have to deal with speculation as to what may happen in the future. Any possible change in our system of electing a President would be bound to produce speculations as to the result in its effect on the people. I do not share the fear which the distinguished Senator from Michigan has mentioned.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SMITH of New Jersey. I yield.

Mr. LODGE. I may say to my friend from New Jersey that if speculating as to the future were a very bad thing, we never would have had a Constitution at all. If we are never going to vote for any legislation because it might involve speculation as to the future, we shall not have much legislation.

Mr. SMITH of New Jersey. We never would have had the United Nations.

Mr. LODGE. That is correct. We might as well look back and confine ourselves to legislation concerning cemeteries. That would be about the only thing left for us to do.

Of course, the Senator is quite correct in saying that under the proposed system Henry Wallace, using the 1948 figures, could come out with 9.4 electoral votes, and he and his adherents would be entitled to whatever satisfaction they could get from that great and glorious fact. But over against that we must put the fact that Wallace and his party were influential in throwing the whole vote of the State of New York to Dewey, and, I think, the State of New Jersey, also——

Mr. SMITH of New Jersey. Let me correct the Senator in that connection. I think we carried the State of New Jersey in an entirely whole-hearted Republican vote.

Mr. LODGE. At any rate, I think the Senator from Illinois, in making up his mind on this matter, should carefully weigh the rather transitory advantage which a third party would receive, due to the publicity and the little burst of newspaper prestige that would come from nine electoral votes. It seems to me the thing which really makes a political organization great is its actual influence and power. That is a far greater help to splinter parties than giving them the little bit of prestige which the Senator has mentioned. I hate splinter parties as much as does the Senator from Illinois, and I am giving up most of my waking hours to endeavoring to make our parties more effective and I think Senate Joint Resolution 2 eliminates any chance that a splinter party can throw the whole vote of a great State one way or the other.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SMITH of New Jersey. I yield.

Mr. LUCAS. The Senator from Massachusetts may be correct. I may be overemphasizing the situation, but I am seriously interested in the Johnston amendment.

I am glad to know that the late Senator Norris introduced in the Senate a similar proposal when he was a Member of the Senate, providing for 35 percent of the whole number of electoral votes. I am only attempting to make an argument against the increase in the number of parties which may exist in this country. I know what the situation is in Greece, in France, and in other nations. If we should have a dozen or 15 parties represented in the Senate or in the House of Representatives and should have to form three or four different coalitions before we could finally have an organization, we would not have any stability or responsibility in government for the American people. I seriously believe that this is a move in that direction. How much of a move it is I cannot say, but I believe it is much more serious than is the situation under the present system, in view of the things I have pointed out.

I do not want the Senator from Massachusetts to misunderstand the Senator from Illinois, because I believe I am in sympathy with what he is trying to do. I believe that the electoral college should be abolished. I think it is out of date. It is of the horse-and-buggy age, so to speak. But at the same time we should be rather careful in what we do when it comes to tampering with the Constitution of the United States. What I hope to do in my limited way, if I can, insofar as my vote is concerned, is to avert a multiple-party system. Having taken merely a brief look at the Johnston amendment, it appeared to me that it had merit. If the former able Senator from Nebraska, Mr. Norris, at one time had a similar view, I am more convinced than ever that I am right, because I had great respect for his opinions. Certainly no more liberal gentleman served in the United States Senate than the late great Senator from Nebraska, George W. Norris.

Mr. SMITH of New Jersey. Mr. President, I will add just a word, and then yield the floor. I agree, of course, with the sentiments expressed by the distinguished majority leader in opposing the principle of multiple parties. It is my judgment that nothing could be worse. If our main parties function as effectively as I think they can, they will both be strengthened, in my judgment, under Senate Joint Resolution 2.

I yield the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. KEFAUVER in the chair). A quorum is present.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, I shall leave the pending business for the time being, and take a few moments on a different subject.

I ask unanimous consent that I be permitted to introduce a bill to amend the Reconstruction Finance Corporation Act, as amended, in order to provide more effective financial assistance for small business, that the bill be properly referred, and that it also be printed at this point in the body of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bill (S. 2947) to amend the Reconstruction Finance Corporation Act, as amended, in order to provide more effective financial assistance for small business, introduced by Mr. LUCAS, was received, read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That subsection (b) (1) of section 4 of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation Act, as amended, is hereby amended by striking out the period at the end thereof and inserting a colon and the following: "Provided, That in order to encourage small business the Corporation is authorized to give management skills, past earnings, and prospective earnings consideration over security in the form of collateral, in the making of loans either directly or in cooperation with banks or other lending institutions under paragraph (1) of subsection (a) of this section for the purpose of establishing new business enterprises or for meeting the long-term capital requirements of existing small-business enterprises. The Corporation shall make direct loans pursuant to the foregoing proviso only in those cases where loans cannot be consummated in cooperation with banks or other lending institutions."

SEC. 2. Subsection (b) (2) of section 4 is amended by adding before the period at the end of the first sentence thereof a colon and the following: "Provided further, That any loan made under section 4 (a) (1) for the purposes set forth in the proviso in paragraph (1) of this subsection as amended may be made for such period exceeding 10 years as the Corporation may deem proper for the encouragement of small business."

SEC. 3. Subsection (b) (3) of section 4 is amended by striking out the period at the end thereof and inserting a colon and the following: "Provided, That such participations by the Corporation may amount to 90 percent of the loan outstanding at the time of the disbursement, in the case of loans made for the benefit of small business enterprises in pursuance of the authority set forth in the proviso in subsection (b) (1) of this section as amended. In order to encourage loans in cooperation with banks or other lending institutions under the proviso in subsection (b) (1) of this section as amended, priority shall be given to private lending institutions over the Corporation against the assets of borrowers for the satisfaction of such loans made thereunder."

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, I am introducing a bill to amend the Reconstruction Finance Corporation Act for the purpose of encouraging small business enterprises in the United States.

The independence of small business and its continuing development and expansion have always been of primary interest to me. During the previous session of Congress, in July of last year, the distinguished chairman of the Banking and Currency Committee [Mr. MAYBANK] introduced Senate bill 2344, to amend the Reconstruction Finance Corporation Act. A short time later I prepared an amendment to Senate bill 2344 which contained the same provisions which are in the bill which I am now introducing. At that time I discussed my amendment with the distinguished chairman of the Banking and Currency Committee, and he agreed that such an amendment should be introduced.

It soon became clear that our crowded legislative program would not permit the consideration of Senate bill 2344 before adjournment. Consequently I withheld my amendment, intending to offer it during this session.

Mr. MAYBANK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LUCAS. I yield.

Mr. MAYBANK. As I remember, it was last August or September when the distinguished Senator from Illinois brought the amendment up, but because of the crowded condition of the calendar and because the Committee on Banking and Currency had before it housing legislation and other emergency legislation, we were unable to hold hearings at that time.

Mr. LUCAS. The Senator from South Carolina is correct.

Mr. MAYBANK. I hope the calendar will not be crowded after the next 2 weeks. This week and next week the committee is disposing of the FDIC legislation and the pending housing legislation. It will be a pleasure for me, as chairman of the committee, to ask that immediate hearings be held on the amendment of the distinguished Senator from Illinois, which I believe should result in legislation which will mean so much to the smaller business interests and smaller firms. I assure the Senator from Illinois of my full cooperation and support for the purposes sought by the bill.

Mr. LUCAS. I am very grateful to the Senator from South Carolina for his kind remarks. I assure him that at the earliest opportunity I shall be glad to appear before the Committee on Banking and Currency and present my views on this important measure.

Rather than propose these changes in the Reconstruction Finance Corporation Act as an amendment to another bill, I am now offering them as a separate bill. In view of the fact that the President in his state of the Union message emphasized the necessity for a small-business program, I am of the opinion that a separate bill restricted to the problems of small business should be immediately submitted to the Banking and Currency Committee.

Mr. MAYBANK. The Senator refers to the RFC legislation, I assume.

Mr. LUCAS. That is correct.

Mr. MAYBANK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me at this point?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. KEFAUVER in the chair). Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. LUCAS. I yield.

Mr. MAYBANK. Mr. President, let me say that I am in thorough agreement with the Senator that the needs of small business should continue to be examined, because it is almost impossible under the existing RFC legislation to make adequate provisions for many small, new firms if they must repay the entire loan in 10 years. This is particularly true of those going into businesses and industries in which the field is rather largely in the hands of a few large firms, in view of the added diffculties which are then presented.

Mr. LUCAS. I agree with the distinguished Senator from South Carolina. The bill which I have introduced would permit loans to small-business enterprises to be made for periods longer than 10 years.

Mr. MAYBANK. I thoroughly agree with the Senator from Illinois that the bill should be considered as a matter concerned with small business as well as a matter affecting the powers of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation.

Mr. LUCAS. I thank the Senator.

Mr. President, the President of the United States in his state of the Union message called our attention to the problems of small business in these words:

> We must * * * provide aids to independent business so that it may have the credit and capital to compete in a system of free enterprise.

He went on to say that he hoped to submit to Congress—

> A series of proposals to strengthen the antimonopoly laws, to assist small business, and to encourage the growth of new enterprises..

I am introducing this bill now, realizing fully that although it may not be the complete answer to all the problems of small-business enterprises, yet it will enable the committee to begin work without delay in examining into the many problems of small businesses.

By beginning now, considerable headway can be made, so as substantially to assure the enactment at this session of small-business legislation along the lines suggested by the bill and in accordance with the recommendations which will be forthcoming from the President.

The most vital needs of small business today are tax relief and access to capital. The President in his message to Congress on January 23 recommended that small businesses with corporate incomes between twenty-five thousand and fifty thousand dollars be given tax relief. He recommended also in his message that the carry-forward provisions for losses incurred by businesses be extended from 2 to 5 years. This would unquestionably provide considerable tax relief to small-business enterprises, and I am certain this Congress will grant such relief, through proper legislation.

Mr. MAYBANK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FREAR in the chair). Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. LUCAS. I yield.

Mr. MAYBANK. I should like to ask the Senator, if it is in order for me to do so at this time, whether he intends to introduce such proposed legislation in regard to the 5-year carry-forward period for business losses and also in regard to tax relief for firms having corporate incomes of between $25,000 and $50,000 annually.

Mr. LUCAS. The bill I am now introducing does not do so, but I am calling this matter to the attention of the Banking and Currency Committee, in view of the fact that I am discussing several ways and means of helping small business. I am confident that the Banking and Currency Committee or some other proper committee will handle the tax-relief question in due course.

Mr. MAYBANK. What concerns me in that respect is that of course proposed tax legislation comes from the Finance Committee, as the Senator from Illinois well knows.

Mr. LUCAS. That is correct.

Mr. MAYBANK. Unfortunately, the jurisdiction of the Banking and Currency Committee in connection with such matters does not extend to questions dealing primarily with tax legislation. I wish to assure the Senator of my full cooperation, and, of course, I am in thorough accord with the ideas of the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. FULBRIGHT] relative to the need for appropriate tax legislation to aid small business. But such legislation would normally come from the Finance Committee.

Mr. LUCAS. I am fully aware of the jurisdiction of the Finance Committee. I am merely suggesting these points as some of the subjects to be considered by the proper committee at the present session of Congress.

Mr. MAYBANK. I think some of the most important subjects to be considered are the means of enabling such firms to amortize their loans on a better basis, to obtain the benefit of a more equitable corporate-tax schedule, to spread their losses over an ensuing 5-year period for tax purposes, and to be permitted a more rapid depreciation allowance for new equipment in computing taxes, because certainly in those fields a great need for improvement exists.

Mr. LUCAS. The Senator is entirely correct. I may say that I am a member of the Finance Committee; and in consultation with the distinguished chairman of that committee, the Senator from Georgia [Mr. GEORGE], I was advised that he is in constant touch with the chairman of the House of Representatives' Ways and Means Committee, Representative DOUGHTON, of North Carolina. I think we shall receive from the House of Representatives a program which will take care of the question I am now discussing more or less collaterally, as my bill does not deal with tax matters.

Mr. MAYBANK. I understand what the distinguished Senator has said, and I am happy to know that the Senator from Georgia and Representative DOUGHTON, the chairman of the respective committees of the Senate and the House dealing with the revenue, will give consideration to these tax matters as soon as possible, because a proper treatment of them is essential.

I may say to the Senator from Illinois that we hope to report, we from the subcommittee of the Banking and Currency Committee on Federal Reserve matters, a measure dealing with the FDIC either this week or next week.

Testimony has been given by witnesses appearing before the Senator from Virginia [Mr. ROBERTSON], who is the chairman of that subcommittee, and other Senators, including the Senator from Delaware [Mr. FREAR], that an increase in the guaranty from $5,000 to $10,000 will make more money stay in the small banks, so that the small banks in the country areas and in the smaller communities will have additional funds to lend. Every witness who has testified before the subcommittee has said that such a provision will help the small-business men in such places. In other words, there will be that much more insurance available to depositors in banks in these areas, making it unnecessary to deposit local money in banks in the larger centers in order to obtain adequate insurance protection.

Mr. ROBERTSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield, so that I may comment on what the Senator from South Carolina has just said?

Mr. LUCAS. I yield.

Mr. ROBERTSON. In the bill which the Senator has introduced, and upon which we hope to complete action in the committee this week, provision is made for a mutual plan of insurance of deposits in insured banks. The present policy is resulting in overloading the reserves a little at the present time.

There has been no loss in 5 years, and only a small loss in 14 years; and the bill contemplates a dividend of 60 percent to the banks. That will be of considerable help to small business. Three-fourths or more of all the banks are small banks.

Mr. LUCAS. I thank both Senators for what they have said. Their statements are a clear indication of the fact that the Banking and Currency Committee is interested in small business; and I congratulate the committee and its members.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LUCAS. I yield.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. I wonder whether the Senator has any idea in mind regarding small-business loans. We have had some difficulty in connection with that matter. As the Senator knows, we have discussed it in the committee. For example, we have discussed the question of where a distinction can be drawn between big-business loans and little-business loans. It is a problem of very practical application, and in the committee we have to deal with it.

Mr. LUCAS. I shall discuss that as I proceed with my remarks. That problem is an important one, but I have not yet reached it in my discussion.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. LUCAS. I yield.

Mr. WHERRY. The junior Senator from Nebraska is also intensely interested in small business, and is in complete sympathy with the observations made by the distinguished majority leader, namely, that two of the problems are relief from taxes and accessibility to loans.

I wish to remind the distinguished Senator that although I appreciate the fact that part of the program will be taken care of if the proposed legislation is enacted in the form in which the distinguished majority leader suggests, yet only one phase of these problems is covered by the bill, namely, loans.

The discussion and colloquy had here on the floor of the Senate in regard to taxes opens up another broad field. If the bill is properly referred, it will go to the Banking and Currency Committee, I think; I believe that the distinguished majority leader will agree with me as to that. If other proposed legislation deals with taxation, it will be referred to the Finance Committee. In such case, two standing committees will be considering problems affecting small business; and those committees will deal with those problems in their own separate ways. I think that example completely demonstrates the need for either a standing legislative committee or a special committee to consider all the problems of small business.

After making that statement, I should like to ask the distinguished majority leader whether, as majority leader, he proposes to bring before the Senate, either before this measure comes up for consideration or later, a measure proposing the handling of the very specialized problems of small businesses.

Mr. LUCAS. I think the Senator's question is pertinent to the discussion which is now proceeding in the Senate.

Mr. WHERRY. If not, I wish to make it so.

Mr. LUCAS. In reply, let me say that I think it was Wednesday of last week that I called a conference of the Democratic Members of the Senate, doing so for the sole purpose of having a discussion of the joint resolution now on the calendar, along with all other pieces of proposed legislation relative to or affecting small business.

There is a feeling on our side of the aisle among a number of Senators that if a committee having to do with small business is to be created, it should be a special committee similar to the committee of which the Senator was chairman in the Eightieth Congress. Other Senators feel differently about it. Others feel there should be a standing committee. Still other Senators feel that the subcommittee of the Committee on Banking and Currency is the proper place for the handling of small-business matters. Because of a slight illness, I was unable to attend the conference, but there was a very frank and fair discussion in the conference, and I may say to the Senator we are going to take up the matter before very long and dispose of it one way or the other upon the floor of the Senate.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for another observation?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. LUCAS. I yield.

Mr. WHERRY. I appreciate deeply the very affirmative statement of the majority leader. By the way, I have already stated on the floor of the Senate that, whether provision is made for a special committee or a standing committee, and regardless of who submits the resolution, I shall support it. I am convinced that if small business is to receive aid, all its problems should be referred to a single committee which could formulate a complete program and make appropriate recommendations for legislation. So I say to the distinguished majority leader, while I am very glad indeed that the particular bill which he sponsors and which, as I understand, relates to the subject of loans, has been introduced, yet it seems to me it would be well if a standing legislative committee, or a special committee, if a legislative committee cannot be agreed on, is proposed to be created, to have that subject debated along with the measure which has been introduced. In the final analysis, I think, those of us who are interested, either in having a special committee or a standing committee, would at least be able to try to convince other Members of the Senate that all small-business matters should be handled by one committee. I should like to see such a proposal brought to the floor of the Senate, if possible, and as soon as possible.

Mr. LUCAS. I should like to make my position a little clearer with respect to small business, in view of the fact that the distinguished minority leader has raised the question as to when the resolution now upon the calendar may be considered. The Senator from Nebraska and all other Senators who are familiar with the Legislative Reorganization Act understand that under it practically all special committees were outlawed. In the early days, under the Legislative Reorganization Act, in attempting to carry out the letter and spirit of the act, the Senator from Illinois opposed continuation of the Special Committee on Small Business. At the time, or perhaps before that, I think the Senator from Nebraska agreed that probably the end of the year would mark the end of the Small Business Committee as a special committee. Since that time, the Senator from Nebraska and the Senator from Florida have offered a resolution seeking to set up a small-business committee, and to make it a permanent standing committee of the Senate. A number of Senators object to that proposal because of the conflict of jurisdiction among the various committees, and the question of the appropriate reference of measures which come before the Senate. Arguments to that effect will be heard when it comes to the floor of the Senate.

I should like to make my position clear as I have been misunderstood and misquoted by certain persons who are interested in small business. I am not speaking now of Senators, but of persons outside the Senate, who have charged me with a lack of interest in the small-business men.

Mr. President, I happen to live in a small-business community. I live in a small city of about 4,500 population, and consequently I have been with small-business people all my life. I have never been affiliated with big business. But I have always been interested in the fellow in the drug store on the corner, in the grocery store in the middle of the block, and in the other small fellow who was having a somewhat serious time financially in trying to get along. Later in my remarks I shall make suggestions for legislative action directly in the interest of these very small-business people.

The bill which I am introducing today concerns itself primarily with the problem of long-term capital.

I should like to state now what is contained in this bill. After that I shall review in more detail the problems which I consider small business to be facing and the extent that this proposal will remedy them.

I want to make it clear at the outset that this bill is not being introduced to offer help to unsound, inefficient, or fly-by-night business enterprises, but rather it is being offered to give capital assistance to efficient businessmen at times when such assistance may be urgently needed.

This bill in effect authorizes the Reconstruction Finance Corporation to guarantee up to 90 percent, loans made by private banking institutions to individuals and small enterprises for the purpose of encouraging the growth of new enterprises on a sound basis and for the purpose of providing existing small business firms with long-term capital when it is needed and when it cannot be obtained from any other source.

Mr. President, I should like to have those who are listening to my address to give particular attention to this. The Corporation in making funds available under this bill is authorized to give management skills, past earnings records, and prospective earnings consideration over collateral security. It is specifically provided that the Corporation shall make direct loans only in those cases where loans cannot be consummated in cooperation with banking and other lending institutions.

Mr. President, I may be seeking the reinstatement more or less of what was considered to be good at one time, among banks, that is, a character loan. It is no longer possible to obtain a character loan in my section of the country, because of reservations which at the present time hedge about the banking laws. In other words, it is necessary for the borrower to furnish adequate collateral—sometimes consisting almost of his right eye—before he can obtain a loan from a bank. The disappearance of the character loan is not particularly the fault of the banks. Following the depression, when 75 percent of the country's banks were in bankruptcy, Federal and State officials surrounded the banks with laws designed to protect depositors. I remember a certain man in my community who borrowed $1,000 at the bank. On the endorsement of a friend of his. That was in the early days, when character loans were being made.

This particular man before any principal was due paid $500 on the $1,000 note. The banker said to that borrower, "From now on you can get $5,000 on your own credit in this bank." That is a character loan. The banker believed in that individual; he believed he had integrity, ability, and energy to do the things that would make him succeed, and the banker was willing to take a chance.

That, Mr. President, is what I have in mind with respect to some of the small business concerns of the country.

Mr. THYE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LUCAS. I yield.

Mr. THYE. Does the Senator suggest a maximum and minimum limit, or would it be merely a question as to the character of the business? I am sorry that I was not able to be present when the Senator began his speech.

Mr. LUCAS. For a proposal such as this to be of essential assistance to small business, it must not be hemmed in with arbitrary restrictions. An arbitrary limit on the amount of a loan might result in aid being denied when it was most needed. If the ceiling were set at a reasonable and adequate level, of course, it would not have this effect. The desirability of such a restriction and the level at which it should be placed are questions which should be considered by the Banking and Currency Committee after thoroughly studying the capital requirements of small business. We can be sure, in any event, that the loans generally will be moderate, as the bill confines assistance to small-business enterprises.

Mr. THYE. I thank the Senator. I am sorry I interrupted him.

Mr. LUCAS. I am glad the Senator asked me the question. I am interested also in small-business enterprises which are looking for loans up to, say, $5,000. The number of business enterprises needing a small amount of capital to put them over the hump at the right time is amazing. Later in my remarks I shall discuss these smaller loans more fully.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LUCAS. I shall be glad to yield to the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. WHERRY. As I understand the explanation, it is necessary that such authority be given to the RFC on the theory that a borrower cannot obtain a loan from a banking agency. This question has come up previously in connection with requests for loans. As I understand the mechanics of the proposal, the RFC would underwrite loans up to a certain percentage. I think the Senator has mentioned a maximum of 90 percent. Is that correct?

Mr. LUCAS. That is correct.

Mr. WHERRY. Would the loans originate as they now originate?

Mr. LUCAS. They would.

Mr. WHERRY. But the percentage is boosted, is it not?

Mr. LUCAS. Yes.

Mr. WHERRY. Let us assume that a State law prevents a bank from making a character loan. Would it be the thought of the Senator to make it possible to make a direct loan without underwriting it through the State bank?

Mr. LUCAS. We could not change the laws of a State.

Mr. WHERRY. No. But let us consider a small-business man who has an opportunity to borrow through a State bank. He probably could go to the RFC and be referred to a national bank, but even national banks are operated under certain restrictions, and a character loan is not a basis for credit.

Does the measure provide that the RFC may make a direct loan without underwriting it, or would it still have to underwrite a proposal coming from a State bank or a national bank; and would that foreclose the applicant from getting the loan?

Mr. LUCAS. The Senator asks a very interesting and important question with respect to this proposed legislation. It is something to which I hope the Banking and Currency Committee will give thorough consideration. I am attempting to leave the responsibility for the loan in the community in which the individual resides, in order to give the bank or financial institution interested the opportunity, first, to make the loan, with the guaranty of the RFC back of it.

Mr. KEFAUVER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LUCAS. I yield.

Mr. KEFAUVER. Mr. President, I am delighted that the distinguished Senator from Illinois has brought up this subject. Such a provision has been greatly needed in the interest of small-business men. I wanted to ask the Senator if his proposal would be somewhat in the nature of aiding small-business men, such as the FHA offers to persons who want to build houses. The Government would guarantee a certain line of credit, provided the small-business man met certain requirements made by the local lending institution which would then participate in the loan.

Mr. LUCAS. The Senator is correct.

Mr. KEFAUVER. I thank the Senator.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, will the Senator further yield?

Mr. LUCAS. I yield.

Mr. WHERRY. I can see that raising the amount up to 90 percent would be a distinct advantage to the applicant, because it would increase his chances of financing the loan over a long period. But I suggest to the distinguished Senator that there will be much conflict as to what can be done with a loan coming to a Federal or State bank, where the basis is that of a character loan, because, certainly, under the State banking laws of my State, certain requirements have to be met. I agree with the Senator from Illinois that those requirements certainly do not include a character-loan provision. I should like to ask the distinguished Senator whether he would provide that the borrower might go directly to the RFC and not have to go through a State or National bank, which has an entirely different basis for credit than that on which a character loan is made.

Mr. LUCAS. Under my bill the loan would not be altogether a character loan. There would certain collateral assets. I assume that the borrower would have enough to satisfy the 10-percent requirement of the bank, and probably more. The guarantee feature, plus the assets which the borrower will offer for security should be sufficient to assure the soundness of the loan and thereby meet the requirements of most State laws. Because of the fact that management skills, prospective and passed earnings are considered, the loans will have many of the qualities of the character loan. This is as it should be in view of what the small, energetic businessman is compelled to suffer at times with respect to obtaining a loan.

Mr. WHERRY. I do not want to belabor the point and I do not want in any way to inject arguments into the Senator's speech.

Mr. LUCAS. I am glad the Senator has asked the question, because he is raising some very important points.

Mr. WHERRY. On last Thursday the Committee on Rules and Administration provided for an appropriation of $50,000 for a subcommitee to investigate the type of loans which the RFC has been making, on the theory that the desired amount of collateral was not behind the loans.

Mr. LUCAS. I do not think the resolution to investigate RFC which has anything to do with the subject of small-business loans. I think it relates to an investigation of large business loans.

Mr. WHERRY. Whether they be small or large loans, the evidence presented was that the RFC was making loans in direct opposition to banks which could not make the type of loan which the RFC was making. For that reason we felt we should see how the RFC was acting.

I have received more applications regarding this type of loan in the past year than I have received during the entire time I have been a Member of the Senate. Applications are coming in, and this will clarify to a great extent, certainly, some of the loans. I hope the Banking and Currency Committee will consider these observations when the proposed legislation is brought before the Senate, because I think there is a complete conflict as to the type of loan which can be made.

Mr. LUCAS. Insofar as the Reconstruction Finance Corporation is concerned, my experience has been that the small-business man, whom I am trying to help, has been unable to get needed loans.

As I move along in my address, I shall indicate that I am not so sure that the Reconstruction Finance Corporation is the proper instrumentality to do what I want done. That is another matter that can be worked out by the Committee on Banking and Currency. I do not know anything about what they are going to investigate. I should want to know something about that before I would, as majority leader, approve the resolution.

I make that statement now because I have confidence in the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, though I do not think they have been sufficiently liberal with the small-business men. That has been my chief complaint.

I now yield to the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. THYE. Mr. President, the particular legislation now proposed would in no sense injure the local banks. It would assist the local banker.

Mr. LUCAS. That is the idea exactly.

Mr. THYE. He would be able to accept the paper offered by and do business with the local young businessman, so that it should be an asset and assistance to the local banks.

Mr. LUCAS. The Senator is absolutely correct. Our aim is to leave money in the community, and try to give the banker a little leeway, a little opportunity, so that money which is now loading down the banks all over the country may be loaned to small-business men who need help. The banks recognize the need, but they cannot give the help, because of restrictions under which they operate.

If they have restrictions which prevent their assisting small-business men—and most of them have—there is no question that the Federal Government should cooperate with the banks and, between them, provide assistance to small-business men throughout the country.

Mr. THYE. It will help the young man who is not eligible to come in under some veterans' assistance or rehabilitation program.

Mr. LUCAS. That is correct.

Mr. THYE. There are many young men in the communities who have no way of becoming established in business, and are not qualified or eligible to come under the veterans' acts, and in such a case a young man is absolutely lost. He may have worked on the farm during the war years, which was a patriotic endeavor, but he is not now eligible to come in under the veterans' acts.

Mr. LUCAS. He may be the type of energetic, industrious businessman that the people in the community would like to see helped, but unless he can get money from a personal source he cannot obtain it at all, if he does not have the collateral to put up to secure the $2,500 or $3,000 or $5,000 which he needs for his business undertaking. Under this bill the banker would be permitted to make the decision in the first instance. The banker would be given the first lien on the young man's collateral, so that the bank would be taking no chance whatever. The Federal Government might accept a slight risk. It might lose money on some loans, but at the same time the Federal Government, in recognizing the ability, the integrity, and the industry of certain groups throughout the United States, would be helping small business. What little the Government might lose would be made up many times through an increase in our national wealth and Government revenues.

Mr. THYE. Mr. President, it would present an opportunity something like that afforded under the Homestead Act after the Civil War. The homestead lands are gone, but in this case governmental assistance would be afforded to enable a man to establish himself in a small business.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, will the Senator from Illinois yield?

Mr. LUCAS. I yield to the Senator from Wyoming.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I wish to express my personal congratulations to the Senator from Illinois for taking the leadership in introducing legislation of the character he is proposing. I know that the Senator from Illinois was busily studying this problem at the last session. As a matter of fact, I understood at that time that he was about to introduce some such bill.

Mr. LUCAS. The Senator is correct.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. He was delayed only by a feeling that it should be given further consideration—and because, of course, he had a few problems on his hands about that time.

I believe it may be appropriate for me to add, Mr. President, that the Joint Committee on the Economic Report, by authority of a special statute which was passed last year, conducted a special study of investments. In the course of the study we held hearings, and I can say without any qualification that it seemed to me that the biggest problem presented was that with which the Senator's bill now deals.

The Department of Commerce, through its special Division on Small Business, sent its whole advisory group of small-business men to the committee, and they testified before the committee. This group was headed by a businessman from Chester, Pa. The group contained among its members a banker by the name of Bimson, from Arizona, and it presented a form of legislation which was designed to provide insurance of business loans after the type of FHA insurance. They were not altogether satisfied with the text of the bill which was presented, and some additional work has been done. We had a very stimulating suggestion from Dr. A. D. H. Kaplan, of the Brookings Institution, who testified at length about the need of fiscal legislative policy along this line.

The committee report is now in process of formulation. I hope it will be presented to the Congress before the end of the week. It will contain references to the very type of legislation which the Senator proposes and also to some of the other suggestions which have been made.

One of the serious difficulties, it seemed to me from the presentation made before the committee, was the difficulty of a small-business outfit in a comparatively small town obtaining term loans, because local banks with their limitations cannot tie up their capital in sufficient sums to take care of all the local business opportunities which are presented in the communities. The result has been that unless big business concerns, great national businesses upon the one hand, or great national financial institutions on the other, are disposed to look at such a loan the applicant cannot get the money. He cannot get it from his local bank because of perfectly normal obstacles. He cannot get it from the large financial institutions because of other obstacles. But already, as a result of the discussion which has proceeded, there is a growing comprehension of the problem. The insurance companies, on the one hand, are seeking ways and means of making their reservoirs of capital more available to the little fellow. The Chase National Bank recently made an announcement on the subject.

Now that the Senator has introduced this bill, I hope the Committee on Banking and Currency will immediately tackle the problem. I am sure they will, and knowing the members of the committee as I do, I feel that they will be very glad to cooperate with the Senator from Illinois and all others who are trying to provide the capital by which we can increase the production of the United States.

Again I wish to thank the Senator from Illinois for his initiative.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, I am deeply appreciative of the contribution made by the able Senator from Wyoming. As every Member of the Senate knows, the Senator from Wyoming has been conscious of this problem for a long, long time. I am sure he and the members of the Joint Committee on the Economic Report can be of considerable help in offering constructive suggestions to members of the Banking and Currency Committee at the proper time. To the solution of the problem of giving aid to the small-business concerns of the Nation we can all help.

Mr. MAYBANK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LUCAS. I yield.

Mr. MAYBANK. For the benefit of the Senator from Illinois and the Senator from Wyoming I wish to say that this morning I introduced a bill to create a Coordinator of Small Business, to be appointed by the President, subject to Senate confirmation. During the past year many amendments designed to aid small business have been placed on appropriation bills and other bills in Congress, but no attempt has been made to place anyone in charge of such proposed aid. If a Coordinator were appointed he could be of assistance to small-business concerns in their dealings with the War Department, the Navy Department, various other departments of the Government, and particularly the ECA. As it now is, it is difficult for small-businesss concerns to get in touch with the various governmental departments. Such a coordinator should report to Congress the results of his operations. He could see to it that small businesses were afforded an opportunity to bid on various projects or items by giving them notice of what was needed, and by proper advertisements, and other appropriate measures.

Mr. LUCAS. I thank the Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. President, the guaranty provisions in this bill utilize the present procedures of the RFC. The RFC participates with private lending institutions in making loans. The private lending institution makes the full loan with an understanding that at a later date it may call upon the RFC to take up a certain percentage of the unpaid balance. This bill authorizes the RFC to take up as much as 90 percent of the loans outstanding which have been made under the terms of this bill.

I have included a clause which provides that the private lending institution in the case of these loans will have priority against the assets of the borrower for the satisfaction of the debt. It appears to me that such a provision is necessary to assure the proper operation of the program. If such a provision were not in the bill private banks might hesitate to cooperate in these loans, as the 10 percent which the RFC did not take up might in numerous cases amount to a considerable sum of money which lenders would hesitate to risk in loans not fully secured with collateral. This problem is solved by giving the private institution first priority against the borrower's assets.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, will the Senator from Illinois yield?

Mr. LUCAS. I yield.

Mr. WHERRY. I do not wish in any way to delay the Senator in his presentation. I wish him to make a full explanation of his bill. When the proposed legislation is considered by the Committee on Banking and Currency perhaps some amendments may be suggested, considered, and acted upon. The argument now advanced by the majority leader should convince all of us that it is doubtful whether the objective we have in mind would be accomplished by the provisions of the bill. After all, private lending agencies must comply with State laws and Federal banking laws in the matter of the risks involved in making loans. The Senator well knows that the Farm Credit Administration was set up to take care of loans to farmers of the nature he is now speaking of to be made to businessmen. After every effort has been made to obtain money from private sources and from other agencies which are held to strict accountability, the Farm Credit Administration is allowed to make loans on doubtful risks.

The Senator's bill provides that the RFC may take care of some such loans. Perhaps the Banking and Currency Committee may recommend some other agency to do so. The bill would authorize the RFC to increase its participation, which I think could be done, even though loss were incurred. But certainly that would be done in direct opposition, I believe, to many State laws affecting private agencies or in opposition to Federal banking laws. I hope when the distinguished Senator presents the bill to the committee it will take that point into consideration, otherwise it seems to me we open up the field for the RFC to make any type of loan it cares to make regardless of requirements which have heretofore attached to the RFC.

Mr. LUCAS. No; the Senator is wrong about that. I have included in the bill a clause which provides that the private lending institution in the case of these loans will have priority against the assets of the borrower for the satisfaction of the debt. The borrower may not have the collateral up to, say, 50 or 60 percent, which the banks require. He may have 30 percent collateral. In cases I cited a moment ago the borrower may have little or no collateral aside from a good reputation for being a hard-working man, who may want to establish a small gas station on the corner. He could pledge the assets of the gas station, so far as that is concerned. He could mortgage the station to the bank. Those would be the assets upon which the bank would have the first lien. I do not see any difficulty in the way the bill is drawn, and if there is any, we can straighten it out in the course of the hearings.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FREAR in the chair). Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from Alabama?

Mr. LUCAS. I yield.

Mr. SPARKMAN. With reference to that particular point, I want to see if I understand the able Senator from Nebraska, correctly. As I gather from what the Senator from Nebraska has said, his point is this: If we make enabling provision for the RFC to participate in these loans on a character basis, in other words to make character loans, then if in some State there is a law forbidding a State bank to participate in a loan on that basis, the small-business man who seeks a loan from a State bank would be left out in the cold. I wonder if I am correctly interpreting what the Senator from Nebraska said.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, will the Senator from Illinois yield?

Mr. LUCAS. I yield.

Mr. WHERRY. What I had in mind was that certain State laws do not recognize the character of a man as being an asset which can be used as such in the making of a loan. State laws require certain collateral to be furnished in connection with the making of loans. If a man wishes to make a loan, but does not have the required collateral, though he does have good character, his application, State-wise, would be denied. When the RFC is authorized to underwrite a loan in which the character of the individual is taken into consideration along with the credit or security he can furnish as collateral, which is not, however, sufficient collateral for the loan, it seems to me the small applicant would be precluded because even though a participation by the RFC up to 90 percent were to be taken in the loan—a provision with which I am in agreement—yet because of State law requirements and Federal banking requirements the small applicant could not obtain from a State bank the loan he wished to obtain.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. President, will the majority leader yield to me further?

Mr. LUCAS. I yield.

Mr. SPARKMAN. I want to be certain that I have correctly understood the able Senator from Nebraska, because I think there is merit in the statement he has just made. Certainly that is a matter which the members of the Banking and Currency Committee should take into consideration when the measure is before the committee. If I understand correctly then, the Senator from Nebraska would recommend that we include in the bill a provision that if, for any reason, because of any requirement in State law or Federal banking law, an applicant might be denied a loan jointly participated in by the local bank and the RFC, the RFC could make the whole loan?

Mr. WHERRY. That is the only way I can see it can be done. I do not say I would write in such a provision. I have not studied the measure sufficiently to make a definite statement. But unless we propose to extend to the RFC the privilege of making loans as they please on a character basis, an applicant of the type we are considering, will be denied the very privileges sought to be accorded by the bill.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. WHERRY. I yield.

Mr. SPARKMAN. I commend the Senator from Illinois for introducing the proposed legislation. It is something I have long felt was needed. The Senator may remember that last year, along with the Senator from Montana [Mr. MURRAY] I introduced a bill providing for several things, of which a similar plan was one. As a member of the Committee on Banking and Currency, I certainly pledge my own support to the effort to enact legislation which will be effective. I, too, hope that the able Senator from Illinois will consider very carefully the recommendation by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. WHERRY] that the RFC be empowered to make direct loans when necessary to effectuate the purpose intended.

Mr. THYE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LUCAS. I should like first to answer the colloquy which has been going on between the able Senator from Nebraska [Mr. WHERRY] and the able Senator from Alabama [Mr. SPARKMAN].

I have never overlooked collateral security, but I have not placed all the emphasis on collateral security. I hope that the individual who applies for a loan may have some collateral security. If he does, I want the bank to have a first lien upon such collateral security, to take care of the 10 percent of the loan in which the bank is interested. However, I call attention to one provision in the bill, which reads as follows:

The Corporation shall make direct loans pursuant to the foregoing proviso only in those cases where loans cannot be consummated in cooperation with banks or other lending institutions.

As I see it, that provision would solve the problem. I do not wish to be placed in the position of saying that the Federal Government should become an agency to lend money to every Tom, Dick and Harry who may come along with any kind of proposal. It will be noted that at the outset I definitely stated that I was not interested in inefficient, fly-by-night organizations to be set up by one or two businessmen for the purpose of trying to get a loan directly from the Federal Government. That situation must be scrutinized with the utmost care. I am interested only in that man who, because of bank restrictions and conditions over which he has no control, is unable, even though he is fully qualified in management ability, to get into a small business which might provide for himself and his family.

Mr. WHERRY. Let me make this observation, because now the distinguished Senator has come to the meat of the problem which we had before us in the Small Business Committee. The only way we can accomplish the purpose which the Senator seeks to accomplish, when there is no collateral, is to make a direct loan. I certainly do not wish to vote that authority to the RFC at this time, because I feel that there should be participation, so long as we have State laws and Federal laws governing certain types of loans. That is where the impact comes. I am glad to hear what the Senator from Illinois has stated. There may be deserving cases in which such loans should be made. If they can be made, well and good, but that is the reason I raised the point which the able Senator has so ably discussed. Probably I should have waited until he had finished his speech, because I see that there is a provision in the bill for direct loans when private lending institutions cannot participate.

Mr. THYE. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. LUCAS. I yield to the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. THYE. I thank the Senator for yielding. The last statement made by the able majority leader in explaining the bill answers the questions which I had in mind. I think he has set forth sufficient safeguards to make certain that the RFC does not bypass the bank; but in the event State laws tie the banker's hands so that he cannot do anything, the bill is broad enough to assist in taking care of the needy cases.

Mr. McMAHON. Mr. President, will the majority leader yield?

Mr. LUCAS. I yield to the Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. McMAHON. I must leave the Chamber for a few moments. I, too, am very much pleased that the majority leader has introduced this bill and is giving his attention to this problem. We guarantee bank deposits, I believe, up to $5,000, and the Senator from Illinois knows the success achieved in stemming the terrible deflationary tide with the Home Owners' Loan Corporation.

I admit that these analogies are not exactly in point, but it seems to me that anything we can do which will lend stability to the small businesses of this country should be a matter of prime concern to every Senator. Connecticut is predominantly a State of small businesses. There is a need for soundly conceived financing and for plans to encourage small business. I share with the Senator from Illinois his determination not to set up a mechanism by which many unworthy people could milk the Treasury. That is not the Senator's purpose, I know; rather, it is the promotion of sound small business, which literally is the backbone of the free-enterprise system. I congratulate the Senator on his approach.

Mr. LUCAS. I thank the Senator from Connecticut.

Another provision in my proposed bill would permit the Corporation to extend maturity dates on loans made under its terms for periods longer than 10 years. This is in accord with the President's recommendations.

I should like at this time to discuss the problems of small business generally. A program which will assure the continued independence and development of small-business enterprises must take into account three different segments of our small-business economy.

First, there are the one and a half million enterprises in which no more than three people are employed and which probably account for as many as 10 percent of the business work force. The capital assets of the business firms in this group do not average more than $5,000 to $10,000.

Secondly, there are those thousands of new business ventures which are born every year. The mortality rate among these new ventures is extremely high, as they are frequently started in a climate wholly unconducive to their continuing existence. The President made specific reference to this group in his State of the Union message.

Finally, there is the group of firmly established business enterprises, employing in numerous instances several hundred workers. It is this group which is in need of long-term capital, and it is this group which has received the attention of most of the recent studies on small business.

A comprehensive program for the encouragement and preservation of small business in America should consider all three of these groups. The bill which I have introduced should considerably encourage the growth of new business enterprises and also assist the group which needs long-term capital.

Studies of small-business problems over the past few years by congressional committees and private organizations show that a large segment of small business is seriously in need of long-term capital which is not available today from private sources. Many private banking institutions as a general policy prefer short-term loans with maturity dates of less than a year. This is not a criticism of the private bank, as its primary concern must be the security of the deposits of its patrons. However, such a policy deprives small business firms of a source of long-term capital. This statement is in line with the suggestion which was made a few moments ago by the distinguished Senator from Wyoming [Mr. O'MAHONEY].

Commercial lending institutions require high interest rates on moderate loans to small business. These interest rates are sometimes two- and threefold the rates of interest paid by large borrowers, even though the risk may be greater in the case of the larger borrower than it is in the case of the small business enterprise.

In any case private capital is available only when loans are perfectly secured against loss. Such security, even if it is available, frequently leaves the borrower with his assets so encumbered that he is unable to obtain working capital. This fact discourages small business firms from borrowing either for the purpose of expanding or for the purpose of instituting more efficient processes.

Investigations have shown that in many instances in an effort to become more efficient small business enterprises have so encumbered their assets in securing long-term loans that they were then unable to obtain working capital in order to put to work their new efficient processes.

This bill which I have introduced would remedy this problem. Established business firms would be able to obtain long-term loans without mortgaging every last dollar of their assets. This would leave them with unencumbered assets sufficient to secure working capital loans. The natural result would be to stimulate private banking business in the making of loans for working capital.

It is a well-known fact that small business firms cannot obtain capital by the marketing of their securities. Underwriters' fees amount up to as much as 20 percent. The records of the Securities and Exchange Commission show that a very small percentage of registered stocks of small companies are finally marketed. Underwriters are hesistant to deal in unknown securities, and the public is reluctant to purchase them. There is clearly a need today for a program along the lines of the one which I am proposing in this bill.

Whenever a Government program is proposed providing for the guarantee of loans, the question always arises as to which is the proper Government agency to administer the program. It is my view that the RFC is adequately organized to handle such a program, although I recognize that other agencies of the Government may also be qualified. This is a matter to which the Banking and Currency Committee should give serious study. It is for this reason that I am introducing this bill at an early date in this session.

The second group of small businesses, which any comprehensive program must consider, are those new business enterprises which are started every year and which fail at an extremely rapid rate. If we are to preserve small business as a healthy part of our economy, we must take steps toward assuring a climate more conducive to the success of new business enterprises.

Ours is a growing society. The population of the United States has practically doubled in the last 50 years. During this same 50 years, trends have generally been toward concentration in business enterprise. Small business as an institution must be able to keep pace in this growing society. It must be able to withstand the trend toward concentration and it must be able to expand at a pace sufficient to supply the services and products demanded by our growing population. In his State of the Union message the President made this statement:

> As our national production increases, as it doubles and redoubles in the next 50 years, the number of independent and competing enterprises should also increase.

The bill which I am introducing takes cognizance of this problem. It will permit loans for such enterprises when there is an economic justification and when there is reasonable assurance that such an enterprise will be successful.

Other programs which can be instituted, and which should be thoroughly investigated by the committee, would promote these new enterprises and also would benefit all of small business. One such program would provide for technological studies in the development of new products at reasonable costs. Small-business enterprises today are unable to maintain experimental laboratories. In this respect they are at a serious disadvantage in competing with large-business corporations.

The United States Government has vested rights in many thousands of patents, acquired during the war, which might be used by small-business firms. The Smaller War Plants Corporation at one time undertook to encourage the use of these patents by small-business enterprises. I am not sure that we did the right thing when we let the Smaller War Plants Corporation expire. Perhaps in the interest of small business we should have kept it as an independent agency.

Consideration should be given now to the possibility of having the Government technically develop these patents to the point where they might be used profitably by small business. This might be accomplished by the Bureau of Standards.

It is generally recognized also that small business enterprises are in need of a central source of information on Federal and State regulations and production and marketing methods. There should be closer cooperation between the Commerce Department and private business groups on a regional basis in providing a clearing house for such information. This suggestion is in line with the bill which the distinguished chairman of the Banking and Currency Committee introduced earlier today.

The last point under a comprehensive small-business program which I should like to discuss briefly is the assistance needed by the one and one-half million enterprises employing only a few individuals, but accounting for one-half of our business firms. I do not conceive that the bill I am introducing will substantially assist this group. The need of these businessmen is for small amounts of working capital ranging from $500 to $2,500. These funds are needed in order that they may take advantage of discounts on purchases. The failure to obtain these discounts leaves them in a bad competitive position.

Many of these firms are now obtaining this working capital from local banks. This is as it should be. Many of these firms, however, cannot obtain funds from local banks because of banking policies or for other reasons. Where this is the case, these very small enterprises must mortgage every last dollar of their assets or resort to mortgaging their accounts receivable, at interest rates ranging around 20 percent.

This problem might be approached through the Federal Reserve System. That organization should be in a position to encourage short-term loans, at reasonable interest rates, by private banks. We might here consider allowing the Federal Reserve to use a portion of its surplus to guarantee such small loans made by private banks. I urge the committee to give consideration to this problem as it affects a very large portion of our small business economy.

This bill does not change the aggregate amount of loans which the RFC is authorized to have outstanding. Such a change might be necessary for the proper administration of the terms of this bill. However, such a change involves many policy considerations, and should receive the serious consideration of the committee.

The bill which I am introducing is directed toward remedying the problem of supplying long-term capital to small business. I am hopeful that under its provisions, assistance can be given to new business enterprises.

This bill is based upon the concept that our problem is primarily one to be solved through private capital. The lending powers of the RFC are to be employed only where private financing is unavailable.

I have submitted suggestions, outside the provisions of this bill, which I believe should be seriously considered. They relate to programs for making working capital available to the very small business enterprises, making information available to all small businesses, and providing technological research in the interest of these firms. All these problems should be studied thoroughly by the committee.

I firmly believe that through a program such as this, we can vitalize free American enterprise and open up new horizons. We might truly say that this will be a point 4 program for America.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LUCAS. I yield.

Mr. WHERRY. I should like to ask a further question. In the event the proposed legislation is not considered favorably, can the Senator tell me what provisions of the present RFC legislation are preventing small business from getting the loans which big business is able to get today?

Mr. LUCAS. I cannot answer that question. I assume that if the RFC wished to exercise the broad discretionary powers it now has, it could almost do, by means of the 90 percent provision alone, what we are attempting to do by means of all the provisions of this bill. But the RFC has not done so. We must bring to the attention of the Government generally the attitude of Congress in regard to loans to small business. This is in line with the President's statement in his State of the Union message. He is just as much interested in seeing something done along this line as are the Senator from Nebraska and the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. WHERRY. I agree that raising the participation up to 90 percent would be most helpful in some cases. I also agree that extension of the time in which to make repayment would be helpful, of course. I hope, however, that if the legislation now proposed or any other measure on the subject is not reported favorably, after due consideration, some thought will be given to what is apparently the discrepancy or discrimination existing in such cases. For instance, we read about loans being made to large operators; but under the present set-up we never read about loans being made to small operators. It may be that legislation on the subject will not be enacted. It seems to me, as has been stated here, that small business should receive treatment equal to that received by big business under the legislation now on the statute books. In the event that remedial legislation on the subject is enacted, I believe that small business should be placed on equal footing with businesses which happen to be able to obtain loans from the RFC, as big businesses now can do.

Mr. LUCAS. I thank the Senator.

Mr. President, I yield the floor.

PROPOSED CHANGE IN METHOD OF ELECTION OF PRESIDENT AND VICE PRESIDENT

The Senate resumed the consideration of the resolution (S. J. Res. 2) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States providing for the election of President and Vice President.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. President, I wish to speak very briefly on the pending joint resolution to change the method of counting the electoral votes in the election of President and Vice President. I am joined as one of the sponsors of this measure, along with the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], who introduced the joint resolution, the Senator from Nevada [Mr. MCCARRAN], the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. FULBRIGHT], the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. HOEY], the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. STENNIS], the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. NEELY], the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. KEFAUVER], the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. SMITH], the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MORSE], and the Senator from Vermont [Mr. FLANDERS]. I joined in the sponsorship of this joint resolution because I have long felt that some improvement was badly needed in connection with the method of election of President and Vice President of the United States.

I know that the advantages of the change have been very fully and very thoroughly discussed. The able Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], the chief sponsor of the joint resolution, made a masterful presentation on the opening day of the debate. I know that practically all the points I might think of have already been developed. However, I desire to take a few minutes to state my position, as being unequivocally in favor of the passage of the joint resolution by the Senate. I hope it will be passed also by the House of Representatives, that the amendment will go to the States, that it may be ratified by the States, and may become part of the Constitution.

The electoral college has never functioned in the manner intended by those who devised the plan of electing the President and Vice President. Instead, there has developed or grown up in this country a two-party system. It is a system of nominating candidates for President, of the two parties going into the respective States in the campaign, of counting the votes in the respective States under the unit rule, and of counting those votes in the mythical electoral college, which is supposed to meet every 4 years for the selection of a President and a Vice President.

When those who wrote the Constitution devised the electoral system, it was their idea that electors, independently selected in the various States, would actually meet, and, exercising their independent judgment, would select for President and for Vice President the two best men they could find in the United States. We of course know that that system did not last very long, and that instead of having the whole United States from which to select, they were in effect limited in each case to two candidates, those put forward, respectively, by the two great political parties. They knew, before they went into the supposed meeting, what the outcome would be.

The people throughout the country, throughout the years, have recognized the weaknesses of the so-called electoral college, and the need of some change, but for some reason we have never been able to effect a change. There have been many proposals of different types, but I believe the proposal contained in the pending joint resolution is the best that has yet been suggested. I think it is fair. I cannot see how it would work to the advantage of any party, any section, or any person. I think it is realistic in the manner in which it proposes to have the votes counted. Credit is given to the votes in the respective States, on a proportionate basis; yet there is preserved and maintained the integrity of the several States in the spirit of the compromise agreement which was reached in the Constitutional Convention, whereby the States are given in the electoral college as many votes as they have Members in the two Houses of the Congress combined. Under the joint resolution that system would be maintained, yet in every State the division of electoral votes as between the candidates would be determined by the number of votes actually received by the candidates within the State.

Mr. KEFAUVER. Mr. President, will the distinguished Senator from Alabama yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. SPARKMAN. I am glad to yield to the Senator from Tennessee, who for a long time has been an advocate of reform of this kind. In the House of Representatives, I remember the interest the Senator from Tennessee always manifested in the effort to bring about some change in our method of electing a President and a Vice President.

Mr. KEFAUVER. I thank the Senator. The Senator from Alabama and I, along with the Senator from Massachusetts, Representative GOSSETT, and many others, have been working on the problem and thinking about it for a long time. The Senator said he did not feel that this plan would work to the advantage of either political party. I am certain, however, the Senator meant to say that, while it would not work to special advantage, or give one party an advantage which it does not now have over the other, yet, on the other hand, it would work greatly to the building up and strengthening of both our major political parties on a Nation-wide basis, in every section of the United States. Does not the Senator feel that that would be one of the chief advantages of the proposed new system?

Mr. SPARKMAN. Yes; and I am glad my friend, the Senator from Tennesssee, interrupted me, because I certainly did not intend to say it would not be advantageous to the parties. I meant it would give neither party an unfair advantage over the other; that is what I really meant.

Yes, Mr. President, during the years there have developed in this country certain one-party sections. I come from an area which is a one-party section. It is a part of the country which is always looked upon as being safely Democratic. What is the result? First of all, consider our general elections. Very few people go to the polls to vote in a general election. We might as well not have a general election in most of the Southern States, because it is a foregone conclusion as to how the vote is going to be cast. Through the passage of the pending resolution, and the adoption of the constitutional amendment putting into effect this method of electing, or of counting electoral votes, there would be an incentive for every person in every State to go to the polls, because his vote would count just as strongly and would be given just as much weight as the vote of anyone in the most doubtful or most closely contested State.

Mr. KEFAUVER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Alabama yield further to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. SPARKMAN. I am glad to yield.

Mr. KEFAUVER. I was very much impressed with the observation of the Senator that the proposal, if put into effect, would help bring out a much larger vote in all the States in all sections of the United States. I wanted to ask the Senator whether he did not think it of equal importance that, in addition to bringing out a large vote, and resulting in more people exercising their right of franchise, we would have in all sections of the United States the great educational value and benefit of political campaigns? In the Senator's State of Alabama, and almost to the same extent in my State of Tennessee, it is very infrequent that the candidates of the major political parties or any of the principal speakers of those parties come to our States for the purpose of discussing the issues of the campaign, and so the citizens of the South, and likewise the citizens of other sections, which have either been marked off or conceded to one or the other of the political parties, lose that great educational value which is so necessary in a democracy.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. President, the able Senator from Tennessee is my closest neighbor, senatorially speaking. We live near each other. We served together in the House for approximately 10 years, and I think he must have acquired a very fine method of anticipating what I am going to say, because he has certainly brought out the very next point which I was going to mention, which is that we miss completely the whole presidential campaign.

Mr. President, I am 50 years of age. During that 50 years—while I cannot remember all the way back, I can remember back to 1908 when Mr. Taft was elected President—I have never seen a presidential candidate in the State of Alabama, with one exception. In 1928 I drove from my home town, Huntsville, to Stevenson, Ala., which is near Chattanooga, in order to see the train of the presidential candidate come through a small corner of Alabama on its way to the State of Tennessee. Tennessee had gone Republican in 1920, and because it had created a doubtful status for itself, the presidential candidate was going to Tennessee to make a speech. There was no need of his coming to Alabama. He did not come there, and no other presidential candidate has ever spoken in the State of Alabama.

That is true, Mr. President, of many of the so-called one-party States throughout the country, not only in the South, but in New England and in the Middle West. There are many States in the Union which are known as one-party States. The result has been that not only do they not have an incentive to vote, as the Senator from Tennessee has so well pointed out, but also they miss completely the educational part of a presidential campaign. In a certain sense it may be said that they are almost disfranchised in the election of a President and Vice President of the United States.

Mr. President, I think the passage of the joint resolution and the adoption of the amendment it proposes would change that situation, and we would have an election which would be truly National-wide. We would have an election which would be carried into every State of the Union. We would have an effort exerted by both the major parties to get out every voter possible.

I have often said, as have any other persons, that we need a two-party system in the South and in every State of the Union. We shall not have a two-party system in the South until some incentive can be given to persons, who may believe in the other party's doctrines, to vote their convictions. Under present conditions their votes simply do not count. I think they should be given an incentive to vote. I believe that is true in every section of the United States and in every State of the Union.

The fact of their being doubtful States, sure States, and "solid" sections has created a condition which was not intended by the founding fathers and which is not for the good of our parties or of our Government. I refer to the natural tendency of each party to limit itself in the selection of Presidential and Vice Presidential candidates to those States which are in the doubtful column and those States which, if won, can deliver, under the present unit system, a large block of votes.

I believe it was contemplated under our form of government that there should be considered eligible and available for those great offices of leadership in the United States every person, regardless of whether he came from one State or from another, a large State or a small State, a one-party State or a two-party State. Yet, under the present system, our parties are almost of necessity narrowed down to a relatively small part of the United States in the selection of the candidates who shall bear their respective banners. If the amendment proposed by the pending resolution should be written into the Constitution it would change that situation and would give us what I believe would be a better chance at republican government in the United States.

There is only one other point I wish to make. I am sure it has been stressed. It is stressed in the report. I refer to the growing tendency of relatively small pressure groups to exert a tremendous and even a dangerous power over the selection of candidates and the election of those candidates to the high offices of President and Vice President.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SPARKMAN. I yield.

Mr. LODGE. There has been considerable discussion as to the effect on our two-party system. Some contend it would tend to weaken the two-party system and to increase the power of splinter parties. I should like to ask the Senator to comment on that matter and the effect which this proposal would have on the vigor and general health of our two-party system.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. President, I am glad the Senator has asked that question. I believe it would tremendously help and strengthen the two-party system. I personally believe in the two-party system. I do not want the time ever to come in this Nation when we have a multiplicity of parties. I think one of the great weaknesses besetting France today is the multiplicity of parties and the difficulty of forming a government, because always there has been the necessity of having a coalition of various parties, and no one party was responsible for the Government. I hope that condition shall never prevail in this country. I think the passage of the resolution and the subsequent adoption of the amendment would strengthen greatly the two-party system and would tend to defeat the development of splinter parties. I do not think a splinter party would have the ability to obtain a toe-hold such as it now has. A splinter party has a chance at this time, because, operating in a large State, such as New York, which has the largest single block of votes in the electoral college, a small minority can very often swing an election one way or the other.

I may be wrong, but I think I have heard many persons say that had it not been for the apparent ability of a third party to change the results in New York State at the last election there probably never would have developed the third party which was headed by Mr. Henry Wallace. I do not know whether that is true. I suppose no one knows. It is bound to be speculative. But we do know that the distinct possibility was held out to a small group that they might swing the great State of New York, and, perhaps, one or two other great States, and thereby might become the balance of power in the United States. That was the encouragement and incentive to a splinter party, if we want to apply that term.

Mr. KEFAUVER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SPARKMAN. I yield.

Mr. KEFAUVER. Ordinarily, in the case of third parties or splinter parties, is not the apparent effort—and frequently the publicized effort—not to put forward what they believe in, with the expectation of winning or doing some good to their own party, but is it not primarily for the purpose of defeating an enemy party and thereby getting the election thrown into the House of Representatives and creating as much confusion as is possible?

Mr. SPARKMAN. Yes; I think that is bound to be true, and I think the motive of so-called pressure groups quite often is to apply as much pressure as is possible to each of the major parties in order to place themselves as nearly as is possible into a position of holding the balance of power.

Mr. KEFAUVER. Is not that done by virtue of the fact that in the history of senatorial elections and elections of governors in the various States, since the beginning of our party system, there have been fewer third parties, or splinter-party efforts, insofar as senatorial elections and gubernatorial elections are concerned, than there have been in presidential elections under the electoral-college system?

Mr. SPARKMAN. I think that is true. In concluding, Mr. President, let me say that I have studied very carefully the proposal under discussion. I have studied it, I will say in all frankness, as a Democrat. I have studied it as one who comes from a solid Democratic section. But most of all I have studied it as one who is interested in orderly, efficient, and sound government in the United States. I believe that if the proposed amendment shall be added to the Constitution it will make for better, cleaner, purer elections. I believe it will make for better and abler party platforms. I believe it will make for a better informed electorate, because it will serve to carry the campaigns to all corners of the Nation. Most of all, I believe it will make for better government, better legislation, better performance generally.

Mr. President, because I believe these things, I am supporting wholeheartedly the pending joint resolution.

CONTRIBUTION TO UNITED NATIONS RELIEF AND WORKS AGENCY FOR PALESTINE REFUGEES IN THE NEAR EAST (H. DOC. NO. 459)

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate a communication from the President of the United States, transmitting a draft of proposed legislation for the authorization of a contribution by the United States to the United Nations Relief and Works Agency for Palestine Refugees in the Near East. The communication from the President and the draft of proposed legislation will be referred to the Commitee on Foreign Relations and printed in the RECORD.

The communication from the President and draft of proposed legislation were referred to the Commitee on Foreign Relations and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE WHITE HOUSE,
Washington, January 30, 1950.

Hon. ALBEN W. BARKLEY,
President of the Senate of the United States.

MY DEAR MR. VICE PRESIDENT: I am transmitting herewith for the consideration of the Congress a draft of proposed legislation to enable the United States to participate in and contribute to the United Nations Relief and Works Agency for Palestine Refugees in the Near East. This agency has been established by the General Assembly of the United Nations to deal with the problems created by the displacement of hundreds of thousands of persons as a result of the recent hostilities in Palestine.

The work of the agency will be to carry out the recommendations of the economic survey mission for the Middle East, appointed by the United Nations. This Survey Mission, under the chairmanship of Gordon Clapp, was directed by the United Nations to study the economic dislocation created by the conflict in Palestine and to recommend measures to reintegrate the Palestine refugees into the economic life of the area. Its recommendations are an example of the kind of development and planning which is essential to the economic growth and improvement of underdeveloped areas. The mission in this survey has taken into account the human and natural resources of the region in which these refugees find themselves, and has recommended a program of economic activity which will be of lasting benefit to these areas and to the standard of living of peoples who live there.

Our aid is needed to put this program into effect and to help the refugees and the inhabitants of these areas in the Middle East to achieve greater productivity through the steps recommended in the report of the mission.

In my inaugural address, I stressed the importance, in the interests of our foreign policy, of economic development of underdeveloped areas. In such a case as this, where relief for refugees is essential, it is advantageous to combine the relief program, with the beginnings of longer range economic development.

Point-4 legislation and legislation for the United Nations Relief and Works Agency for Palestine Refugees are complementary. There is no overlapping in the request for funds for the two programs.

The immediate reason for the establishment by the United Nations of the economic survey mission to the Middle East was the hope that through an economic approach it might be possible to facilitate a peace settlement between the Israel and the neighboring Arab states. The problems of Palestine and her neighbors are complicated by the continuing plight of over three-quarters of a million persons who left their homes during the conflict in Palestine, and are now refugees in the neighboring lands. Homeless and without work, these people cannot care for themselves. The nations now giving them asylum are themselves unable to care for them. For some time to come they will remain dependent on others for their support.

In response to an appeal from the General Assembly of the United Nations for relief funds, made in December 1948, I recommended to the Congress that the United States should bear up to one-half of the cost of a relief program which was estimated to cost $32,000,000 for a 9-month period. The Congress appropriated $16,000,000 for this purpose. Our contribution has been more than equaled by the contributions of 32 other countries. The fund thus raised has been stretched to its limits and is now exhausted.

The United Nations Economic Survey Mission has recommended a combined relief and public-works program, and has estimated the cost of this program at $54,900,000 for an 18-month period beginning January 1, 1950.

This program is significant in its practical approach to our objectives of economic development in underdeveloped areas. The areas in question have unrealized economic potentialities but require technical assistance from abroad to assure their development. The projects proposed will be complete in themselves, representing intensive development in small areas, and have been so selected that they can be brought to completion by the middle of 1951. They will result in lasting economic benefits.

In illustrating what can be done with limited resources of soil and water by the application of modern engineering and agricultural techniques, these projects should point the way to further development not only in the countries where they are carried out, but in neighboring countries as well. The successful completion of this program should go far in furthering conditions of political and economic stability in the Near East. At the same time the proposed program, while costing little more than direct relief, looks to the end of the direct relief program of the United Nations in the Near East, and to ultimate solution of the refugee problem.

I believe that it is appropriate that the United States should continue to bear one-half the cost of this program. I, therefore, recommend that the Congress authorize and appropriate $27,450,000 for an 18-month period. I trust that other nations which have contributed to the program in the past will be equally generous in the future.

The importance of a substantial United States contribution to this program is very real. Not only is it consistent with the humanitarian spirit of the American people; it is also in our national interest to help maintain peaceful and stable conditions in the Near East.

It is with these considerations in mind that I recommend to the Congress the early enactment of legislation to enable the United States to take its part in this program of the United Nations.

Sincerely yours,

HARRY S. TRUMAN.

Joint resolution for the authorization of a contribution by the United States to the United Nations Relief and Works Agency for Palestine Refugees in the Near East

Resolved, etc., That the Secretary of State is hereby authorized to make contributions from time to time before July 1, 1951, to the United Nations for the United Nations Relief and Works Agency for Palestine Refugees in the Near East, established under the resolution of the General Assembly of the United Nations of December 8, 1949, in amounts not exceeding in the aggregate $27,450,000, for the purposes set forth in the said resolution.

PROPOSED CHANGE IN METHOD OF ELECTION OF PRESIDENT AND VICE PRESIDENT

The Senate resumed the consideration of the resolution (S. J. Res. 2) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States providing for the election of President and Vice President.

Mr. KEFAUVER. Mr. President, I had desired to have recognition at this time in my own right, but the hour is late, and if I could be recognized at the beginning of the session tomorrow by unanimous consent, I should be glad to speak at that time.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the junior Senator from Tennessee that he have the right to speak tomorrow when the Senate convenes? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

RECESS

Mr. KEFAUVER. I move that the Senate take a recess until 12 o'clock noon tomorrow.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 5 minutes p. m.) the Senate took a recess until tomorrow, Tuesday, January 31, 1950, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

MONDAY, JANUARY 30, 1950

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

O Lord, our Lord, surely our lines are fallen into pleasant places, Thou hast possessed us of a land flowing with milk and honey, but Thou who holdest our destiny in Thy hand, teach us that the glory of any people is in the moral and spiritual fiber woven into the Nation's heart.

Father of mankind, keep us in the realization that our assignment to this Chamber means a large privilege and opportunity. Grant that we may put our intelligence, our power of will, and our strength of moral earnestness into our every task and decision. In an ease-loving day, do Thou disturb our country's complacency and make us alert to every threatening force. Help us to build for peace rather than for war; for brotherhood rather than divisions, cherishing above all else the glorious destiny of our free land. In our Redeemer's name. Amen.

PRESIDENT McKINLEY'S BIRTHDAY ANNIVERSARY

Mr. JENKINS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio?

There was no objection.

Mr. JENKINS. Mr. Speaker, yesterday was President McKinley's birthday. As you know, for more than 20 years the Ohio delegation in Congress has observed this event by making short addresses on this floor and by passing carnations around. The carnation was his favorite flower and for many Ohioans it is the State flower. I am glad to see today that many of the Members on the Democratic side are wearing the carnation.

It might be interesting for you to know that one of McKinley's stanchest friends was a Democrat from Texas, Roger Q. Mills. He and McKinley worked together for many years on the Ways and Means Committee on programs for the best interests of the country.

I might further say, just by way of more or less a matter of personal interest, that Mr. McKinley's greatest work, we think, was done here on the floor of the House. More important was his work here on the floor than his work as governor or President. His service on the field of battle in the War Between the States was very creditable.

A little incident has come out of his military service that will be very interesting. Much of his military activities were carried on in the Shenandoah Valley, and he naturally got acquainted with many privates and officers in the Confederate Army in that section. Just about the close of the War Between the States he was elected to membership in the Masonic lodge in Winchester, Va., and every officer in the Masonic lodge who was present at his initiation had been an officer in the Confederate Army. They thought that was a great compliment to him to be worthy and a greater compliment to them for their chivalry and fairness.

Although that was a great controversy, it shows how manhood and character were recognized by the officers and men of the contending forces.

Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members who wish to extend their remarks about President McKinley may do so at this point in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio?

There was no objection.

THE LATE PRESIDENT ROOSEVELT

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, down through the history of our constitutional government is a long line of outstanding men who served as Chief Executive of our country; all men of integrity; all men of honor; all men of deep patriotism and love for our country, without regard to party; and all men who served their country while they occupied that office to the best of their ability.

In this generation of America's contributions to not only the strong Presidents of our country, but to the great men of all times, is the late, lamented Franklin Delano Roosevelt. If he were alive, today would have been his sixty-eighth birthday. Most of us who are here today knew him personally, because we served while he was President of the United States.

Franklin D. Roosevelt was one of the great constructive figures of the known history of man. As we study history, we find two lines of outstanding figures, one on the destructive side of life, and the other on the constructive side of life. Franklin D. Roosevelt was one of the outstanding figures in history on the constructive side of life. Without regard to whether one agreed with his policies and his views, I know that each and every one of my colleagues have a deep respect for his memory, and that all Americans equally have a deep respect for his memory.

It is only fitting and proper that, as in the case of the late President McKinley, a great American, we should pause today to pay tribute to the memory of the late President who served during this generation, a man of deep faith, a man of intense religious feeling, a man who had love of God and love of country in his heart, a man who loved his fellow man, and who exemplified to the furthest extent humanly possible the brotherhood of man and the fatherhood of God. It is only fitting and proper that we pause today to pay tribute to the memory of that great man, the late Franklin Delano Roosevelt.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, all Members desiring to do so may extend their remarks at this point in the RECORD on the life and services of Franklin D. Roosevelt.

There was no objection.

Mr. CARROLL. Mr. Speaker, today is the anniversary of the birth of Franklin Delano Roosevelt 68 years ago.

This date of January 30, already of national and world-wide importance, is one which will come to be more and more significant in America's calendar of observances as time goes on. For, with the passing of the years, historic perspective will lend a truer evaluation of the greatness of the late President.

We of this generation are perhaps too close to the events of this era to assay President Roosevelt's full stature in accurate proportion to the whole sweeping panorama of America's progress and its contribution to the advance of civilization as a whole. We leave that timeless estimate to the historians of the ages.

For ourselves, we cherish the greener memories of the man as we knew him: his inspiring leadership, his love of humanity, his high ideals, and his courageous striving to attain those ideals.

It has been said that the divine providence who guides our destiny has always produced, in every crisis this Nation has faced, the right man to lead and to guide us. Such was the fortuitous advent of Franklin Roosevelt to the Presidency of the United States.

Who can forget his inauguration that bleak March day in 1933 when he flung into the teeth of despair his ringing challenge that "the only thing we have to fear is fear itself"?

From that very beginning, when he lifted up the spirits of a people who were bowed down, he carried us along the path of confidence to high achievement.

Such was the exuberance of the man, so great was his faith in our democratic principles and in our inherent and potential strength, that he stirred our spirit to the level of his own. He renewed our courage and restored our morale. He revived us from despondency.

Without this moral stimulation, recovery from the black depression of the early thirties would not have been possible. All of the delicate, artificial mechanisms of economics would not have sufficed alone to feed the starving, to make jobs for the unemployed, to restore profits to business.

It seems to me that it was President Roosevelt's unique gift and power to be able to give hope to the suffering that, above all, endeared him to the multitudes. All of us in our lifetime suffer in some way or other; a private grief, a physical ailment—but something. Franklin Roosevelt, as a young man, was the victim of infantile paralysis. Yet he overcame his infirmities sufficiently to rise to the highest office in the land.

He emerged from his ordeal physically handicapped but mentally and morally strengthened. It was something of this inner strength that shone in his personality and exuded from his whole being, which he was able to communicate to the men and women—and yes, particularly, to the children of the United States.

He personified and symbolized to millions of people the human struggle for survival against odds, and the ability to overcome handicaps, whether they be physical weaknesses, economic poverty, racial or religious prejudice, or political heresy. So, in that broad sense, in which he captured the imagination of a people and endeared himself to them, Franklin Roosevelt was a minister to our national soul.

But one who thus raises hopes runs the grave risk also of creating a vast disillusionment if he fails to fulfill those hopes. In the case of President Roosevelt, happily for the people, for the Nation, and for the world, the hopes he engendered were brought to fruition.

President Roosevelt lived up to his promises. He fulfilled his pledges; he demonstrated, to the amazement of other types of politicians, that good government is good politics; and he became the first man in the history of this country to be four times elected by the people to the highest honor within their power to bestow.

It is possible he may be the only President to achieve that honor because, as you know, the Congress has approved and submitted to the States a proposed amendment to the Constitution to limit a President to two successive terms, and this has been ratified by 23 States.

The influence of Franklin D. Roosevelt lives on today. In April it will be 5 years since he passed away at Warm Springs, Ga., nearby the healing site that was established through his efforts to aid the victims of polio.

No more fitting tribute is paid his memory than the establishment of his annual birthday as a special time for remembering those afflicted with this disease. In death, as in life, he still gives inspiration to the cause of aiding your fellow men—helping those in need, lifting those who have fallen—restoring to the individual that dignity which proclaims we are all made in the image of God.

The political strife, the partisan differences, the debated issues during the heyday in office of Franklin D. Roosevelt have been swept into the past on the currents of time.

On the shore, in the wake of the tide, remain the clean and glittering solid rocks of achievement, the innovations and reforms, milestones of social justice, political democracy, and economic freedom for all.

That the heritage which President Roosevelt bequeathed to the people is treasured by his successor and by the Democratic Party today was eloquently demonstrated in this House by President Truman in his state of the Union message.

The greatest homage which can be paid the memory of the late President is the continuation in practice of those principles for which he fought throughout his life.

Mr. GORDON. Mr. Speaker, the 30th of January in this year of 1950 would have marked the sixty-eighth anniversary of the birthday of the greatest figure living in our time and one of the greatest of all time if Franklin D. Roosevelt had been spared to see this day.

With the advent of the midcentury mark, historians, journalists, chroniclers, and commentators have busied themselves with the publication of lists of the outstanding men of the preceding 50 years. In every one of these lists the name of our late beloved President has led all the rest. It has recently been tabulated that since his death a short 5 years ago, more than 100 books have been written about his astounding career, his life, his habits, and his philosophy.

The fascination of the man is a natural magnet for the biographer, the political analyst, and the historian. The material in these volumes is an outstanding story of history, and many more must needs be written before all of the facets of the great character of Franklin D. Roosevelt are made known by historians.

To those who knew him, however, to those who personally felt the impact of his genius, no accumulation of written words can ever be substituted for the warm friendliness, the deep understanding, the impressive vigor, and the genuine love which emanated from his vibrant personality.

It is characteristic of the man that so personal a thing as his birthday anniversary should now be a day of dedication to the humanitarian cause of relief from suffering and physical pain. This is as it should be, because if any one quality of Franklin Roosevelt's character took precedence over the others, it was that intangible but endearing quality of his humanitarianism. This quality, I believe, was the outgrowth of his religious faith, his great courage, and the magnitude of his physical and spiritual strength.

It was the basis of his political philosophy and his conception of government as an instrumentality for the service of man. His whole program of social legislation was aimed at the elimination of the cancers of fear, want, poverty, social injustice, physical suffering, and human indignity from the body politic.

Both in war and in peace, his primary concern revolved continually around the rights of man as an individual and as a member of society, and he acted with resolution on the principle that the salvation of the world lay in recognition and effectuation of the brotherhood of man and the fatherhood of God.

Time and the perspective of history will undoubtedly delineate the true picture of Franklin D. Roosevelt. No future research, however, can add a cubit to his stature in depicting what we already know of his vivid imagination, his bold courage, his diligent mind, his insatiable curiosity about the welfare of his fellow men, and the global range of his interests. With all of his multitudinous preoccupations, his greatest virtue was that he had a deep, abiding, and genuine love of people as people.

On this his birthday anniversary, may his great and generous soul rest eternally in peace.

Mr. MULTER. Mr. Speaker, I think it is a wonderful idea each year on this day to interrupt our regular procedure and business of the day to pay homage to the memory of a great leader, whose name will remain immortal in the history of this country and in the annals of present-day civilization. This is the sixty-eighth anniversary of the birth of the late Franklin D. Roosevelt. He was not merely a dynamic leader of his people, but a great force for peace among all peoples in the world.

His tireless efforts for the welfare of all mankind are known throughout the world. It is all still so fresh in our minds and so vivid, that it is difficult to believe he has not been with us for almost 5 years. But just as his memory lingers and will continue to linger with us for many years to come, so will his ideas and ideals be a guiding light to us and we shall feel the effects of his work and accomplishments for a long time.

On the occasion of the anniversary of his birthday, I believe no better tribute can be paid to his memory than prompt ratification by the United States Senate of the Convention on the Prevention and Punishment of the Crime of Genocide. If Franklin D. Roosevelt were alive today, I have no doubt that he would be one of the strongest advocates for outlawing this unspeakable crime as a major blot on our civilization.

Furthermore, I am certain that, as a great reformer and advocate of human progress, he would have urged immediate adoption of this convention whereby for the first time in history, nations would bind themselves in solemn covenant to assure that the barbarism of exterminating millions of people on racial, religious, or national grounds, which has so recently shocked the world, would never again occur.

Ratification and adoption of the Genocide Convention will be a milestone in the progress of civilization. The United States has always prided itself in being a force for human progress and constructive effort, particularly in recent years, and I am therefore hopeful that our country will also lead the way in ratifying this convention.

Before the memory of the recent horrifying genocidal acts has faded from the minds and conscience of man, let us take appropriate and positive action to outlaw the crime of mass murder of whole nations and peoples. Many nations are waiting for the United States to show the way. In so doing, we shall best honor the memory of Franklin D. Roosevelt, a great leader of his people, whose very name is today a symbol of world peace and human progress.

PRICING PRACTICES

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's desk the bill (S. 1008) to define the application of the Federal Trade Commission Act and the Clayton Act to certain pricing practices, insist upon the House amendment, and ask for a further conference with the Senate.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

Mr. PATMAN. I object, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Speaker, I wish to serve notice that tomorrow morning I shall make a preferential motion to send the bill to further conference.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. RANKIN. That motion is not in order in the House?

The SPEAKER. That motion will be in order because the bill has been to conference and disagreement has been reported.

Mr. RANKIN. Does it require a two-thirds vote?

The SPEAKER. No; a majority vote.

ARMY ENGINEERS

Mr. TABER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Speaker, I have been tremendously disturbed by the hearings that have been released from the Appropriations Committee indicating that the Chief of the Army Engineers has estimated that the cost in the fiscal year 1951 for certain rivers and harbors and flood-control projects, including flood control on the Mississippi River, will be increased $583,000,000 over the figures that were sent up here for the fiscal year 1949. Some estimates of the cost of individual projects have in that period been multiplied by five. This is one of the most terrific increases I have ever heard of, when a project is appropriated for in one year and then in the next year the estimate of cost is increased.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. JACKSON of Washington (at the request of Mr. GRANGER) was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and insert an article.

Mr. GATHINGS asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD in two instances and include extraneous matter.

Mr. HART asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include an address by the Attorney General.

Mr. ENGLE of California asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include an editorial.

Mr. TRIMBLE asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include an editorial.

PROPOSED NEW CURRENCY DESIGN

Mr. SUTTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Tennessee?

There was no objection.

Mr. SUTTON. Mr. Speaker, on January 23 I introduced a bill (H. R. 6931) to provide for the issuance of currency of a new design and color, in exchange for our present currency, as a means of detecting violations of the Internal Revenue Code and the tariff laws of the United States, to rectify and correct other situations which have arisen, as it is believed that the Russians may have our dies and are printing American dollars. This bill would make any such bogus or counterfeit currency void as well as be most helpful in apprehending the holders of the currency recently stolen in the brazen and dramatic Brink robbery in Boston.

It is estimated that of the approximate 29 billions of dollars we have in circulation today, some five to ten billion dollars are in safety-deposit or lock boxes, much of which is being hoarded in seclusion for tax-evasion purposes. I have discussed this matter with the attorney general's office, Internal Revenue, the Office of the Secretary of the Treasury, local bankers and others. The figures I have just given to you have been verified by these inquiries. I trust that the Committee on Banking and Currency will hold hearings on this bill and I hope they will report it out favorably, thus directing the Secretary of the Treasury to correct situations that are unfair and which are an injustice to every honest taxpaying American citizen.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Tennessee has expired.

PERSONAL PRIVILEGE

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of personal privilege.

The SPEAKER. Will the gentleman state what it is, or let the Chair see the matter of which the gentleman complains? The Chair does wish that Members who intend to rise to a question of personal privilege would let the Chair have some notice of their intention.

Mr. RANKIN. I rise to a question of personal privilege, Mr. Speaker, on one of the most stupid, asinine, and exaggerated articles that I have ever seen written about a human being which appears on the eighth page of the Washington Daily News of today and in other Scripps-Howard newspapers throughout the country.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not yet know the matter on which the gentleman claims his question of personal privilege.

Mr. RANKIN. I will be glad to have the Chair read the article.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would at least like to see the article so that the Chair can know whether or not the gentleman is presenting a question of personal privilege.

After looking over the article hastily, may the Chair inquire of the gentleman what part of the article he objects to?

Mr. RANKIN. All of it, from the headline on down. It is written for the purpose of discrediting your humble servant.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman think there is anything in this which reflects upon him as a truthful man, or upon him in his representative capacity?

Mr. RANKIN. I think that is the purpose of it.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not see it that way. There is argument on the other side of the question and the Chair is sure that all Members of the House understand it is not necessary for their colleagues to rise to a question of personal privilege to defend themselves against any article which criticizes them.

Mr. RANKIN. As I said, Mr. Speaker, it is one of the most asinine and stupid smears that I have ever seen written about a Congressman. All I want is an opportunity to answer it.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the gentleman from Mississippi may proceed for 1 minute.

There was no objection.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, this article starts out with the heading "Representative RANKIN is very generous—with Government money." It goes ahead and accuses me of introducing bills which would cost the Government $125,000,000,000.

It ignores the fact, and does not give the Congress the information, that the chairman of the Committee on Veterans' Affairs usually introduces, "by request," the bills presented by the various veterans' organizations, many of which of course are duplications.

This article is published to try to mislead the country and to discredit the Committee on Veterans' Affairs, of which I am chairman, by discrediting me.

The bills that we will report from our Committee on Veterans' Affairs this year will not cost half as much as the money that has been poured down the rat holes of Europe, Asia, Israel, Africa, and Japan, at the expense of the taxpayers of the United States—including the veterans and their children and grandchildren.

Mr. Speaker, I yield back the remainder of my time.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. BECKWORTH asked and was given permission to extend his remarks with reference to the Sabine watershed, notwithstanding the fact that the time will cost $382.62.

Mr. MULTER asked and was granted permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD in two instances and to include extraneous matter.

Mr. GORSKI asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include a resolution passed by the Common Council of the City of Buffalo.

Mr. MAHON asked and was given permission to revise and extend the remarks which he intends to make later in the day and include certain extraneous excerpts.

Mr. PRIEST asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD and include a statement on electoral college reform, by the former member from California, Mr. Lea.

Mr. BREHM (at the request of Mr. BROWN of Ohio) was given permission to extend his remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD.

Mr. MASON (at the request of Mr. BROWN of Ohio) was given permission to extend his remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD.

Mr. BROWN of Ohio asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD and include a statement on Federal-State relations to education, made by Dr. James K. Pollack, late of the Hoover Commission and head of the department of political science of the University of Michigan.

ALGER HISS

Mr. HALE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Maine [Mr. HALE]?

There was no objection.

Mr. HALE. Mr. Speaker, Secretary Acheson in making his impassioned declaration of loyalty to Alger Hiss referred his critics to the Gospel of St. Matthew in the twenty-fifth chapter.

There is much other excellent material in the gospel according to St. Matthew which the Secretary might have cited. For example, in chapter 6, the evangelist reports a sermon preached upon a mountain and in verse 24 he quotes Jesus as saying, "No man can serve two masters: For either he will hate the one, and love the other; or else he will hold to the one, and despise the other."

The people of the United States are now led by the Secretary's own words to believe that he will hold to Alger Hiss who has been convicted of perjury, but everyone knows that his crime was of a treasonable character. Will not a man who publicly professes such devotion to a proven traitor despise his other master, the United States? He has lost a continent by coddling the friends of communism. His refusal to face the consequences of the Hiss verdict is of the same quality as his refusal to face the consequences of Mao Tze-tung's conquest of China. Such usefulness as he has had has now terminated. The country expects him to resign. He should do so before causing us further embarrassment.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Maine has expired.

THE OIL INDUSTRY

Mr. GAVIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GAVIN]?

There was no objection.

Mr. GAVIN. Mr. Speaker, oil producers in the Pennsylvania grade crude-oil fields are greatly alarmed, and rightfully so, over the President's recent statement concerning the depletion provision in the income-tax law.

This proposal would crucify the stripper oil fields of the Nation, and its enactment would end the oil-producing business in hundreds of communities where stripper wells make their daily contribution to the national oil supply.

I will vigorously oppose, as will other Members of this body, any attempts to make any change in the present law.

Mr. Speaker, I want to call to the attention of the House that our Government at the present time is permitting the importation of approximately 750,000 barrels of foreign oil a day; this flood of oil is working a tremendous hardship on the stripper fields and independent producers. It becomes increasingly evident the administration is endeavoring to deliver another crippling blow and impose another undue burden on the producing industry; particularly the small independent producer who has already been affected by decreased production, by sharp price cuts during the past year, by increased taxes, increased labor and material costs, and an increase on everything that enters into the production of oil.

In my district, the oldest of the oil-producing areas in the United States, there are thousands of these small wells. Operators are diligently striving to apply methods, as they get the capital to do it, which will prolong the life of the small wells, and thus help to provide for the national needs. In Pennsylvania, New York, West Virginia, and Ohio there is produced between 50,000 and 60,000 barrels daily of the highest grade lubricating base oil. It is my opinion that only because of this depletion allowance has this field been able to exist.

Mr. Speaker, the depletion provision in the law has existed in one form or another since there was a tax on incomes. Successive Congresses, without regard to party majority control, have reviewed the depletion allowance and have found it sound in principle and in amount. It has been agreed that the effect of the provision was to aid in the discovery and development of oil and gas. Without it the producer would find it necessary to sell his capital assets and wind up his business. In my district and throughout my State, wells would be abandoned by the thousands in a short time if the administration's proposal should be accepted. The great and nationally important secondary recovery programs of the producers would be ended. Hundreds of millions of barrels of oil have been recovered under such programs that otherwise would be lost forever.

It would result in not alone a loss of oil to the Nation, but a loss in income taxes and would throw thousands out of work who are dependent upon stripper fields for their livelihood.

It would appear that the administration is trying to write off the stripper oil fields of the Nation as an economic casualty at a time when the small operator is struggling to exist. It seems the harder the people in the oil-producing business work, the more they risk, the more hazards they take to produce oil to meet the needs and demands of the Nation, the harder some Government bureaucrat works to think up a plan to stymie his efforts. To follow the recommendations of the administration would put a road block in the way of the stripper producer which would eventually put all stripper fields out of business. There should be no change in this law.

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, I agree 100 percent with my colleague from Pennsylvania [Mr. GAVIN]. We must protect these oil producers.

SECRETARY ACHESON'S FRIENDSHIP FOR HISS

Mr. JENSEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Iowa?

There was no objection.

Mr. JENSEN. Mr. Speaker, millions of Americans must have been shocked when they learned that Dean Acheson, our Secretary of State, had resorted to quoting the Bible to explain his reasons for his continued friendship for Alger Hiss, convicted of perjury about his giving of aid to ungodly Communist Russia and her henchmen, who deny Christ, and threaten everyone every place in this world who so much as dares publicly mention the word of God.

Mr. Speaker, our present Secretary has not only insulted every Christian in the world by quoting the Good Book in his support of Alger Hiss, but also our flag, the symbol of Christian constitutional Americanism, and everything for which it stands, has been dragged in the mire. Now I ask in all seriousness, why and how much longer will the State Department, with the apparent blessing of the White House, be permitted to give aid and comfort to the enemies of our liberties here as well as beyond our shores, while the deadly dagger of communism is stabbed in the hearts of decent people and nations all over the world?

Surely our President must be well aware of the fact that our Secretary of State must above all else have the full confidence and respect of the representatives of other Christian peace-loving people of the world in order to now foster, create, and perpetuate a strong family of nations pledged to insure lasting peace and to protect and defend our Christian civilization against ruthless, barbarian, communistic aggression. Hence, it must be plain to every thinking person everywhere that Dean Acheson has by his recent utterances and avowed continued friendship for Alger Hiss rendered himself entirely helpless and ineffective to carry on the great responsibility of the office of Secretary of State of these United States of America.

Therefore, as a Representative of the American people and in all sincerity and humbleness, I respectfully urge our President to immediately request the resignation of the Secretary of State, Dean Acheson, as on the disposition of this matter will rest our destiny and world peace.

THE ALGER HISS CASE

Mr. HILL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Colorado?

There was no objection.

Mr. HILL. Mr. Speaker, the Alger Hiss case is an infamous page in history. In it we see how the Communists have gnawed away at the pillars of our Government, like termites eating away the foundation of our home. The high respect in which we have held the State Department is destroyed. The light of suspicion will be thrown on every act of the Department in the future.

Since the Hiss red herring was snagged by the House Un-American Activities Committee, I wonder how many more Communist sympathizers are hidden in the State Department.

Hiss is only an individual. But he had all of the great advantages our country has to offer. He was given the greatest of opportunities to serve his country during a crucial period in its history. He followed the wrong path.

This case, which has had all of the benefits of our broad system of justice, has been decided. Hiss, like all others who would destroy all that is good, is finished.

Our country has been alerted. Other Hisses must go regardless of the close friendship expressed for them by the Secretary of State.

THE ALGER HISS CASE AND VERMONT

Mr. PLUMLEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Vermont?

There was no objection.

Mr. PLUMLEY. Mr. Speaker, I feel constrained to say to those Members who have rather scornfully referred to the fact that Alger Hiss undertook to get a change of venue and be tried in Vermont, by reason of the fact that he was a summer resident there, that the insinuation and the implication that Vermont is saturated with Communists is unfair and is not true.

THE ALGER HISS CASE

Mrs. ST. GEORGE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentlewoman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mrs. ST. GEORGE. Mr. Speaker, our present Secretary of State has proved himself of poor judgment in the choice of friends; he has also proved himself not very adept in his choice of quotations from the Bible. How anyone can compare the perjurer, Alger Hiss, to the poor, needy, and unfortunate whom we have been told to care for in the name of Heaven, is more than I can see.

There is, however, one apt quotation that might be brought home to our Secretary of State and others, and that is this one from St. Matthew: "Depart from Me, ye that work iniquity."

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. JENKINS asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD and include a newspaper clipping.

Mr. McGREGOR asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD and include a newspaper editorial.

Mrs. ST. GEORGE asked and was given permission to extend her remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD in two separate instances and in each to include extraneous matter.

Mr. AUCHINCLOSS asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD and include an address given by John W. Haynes, chairman of the Tax Foundation.

Mr. PATTERSON asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include an editorial from the New York Herald Tribune.

Mr. D'EWART asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD concerning the relief of Indians in Montana.

Mr. O'SULLIVAN asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include an editorial.

Mr. RANKIN asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD on the subject of dead animals on our highways.

Mr. BROOKS asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD in two instances and include extraneous matter.

Mr. CELLER asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD in two instances.

Mr. CARROLL asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include an article.

Mrs. DOUGLAS (at the request of Mr. CARROLL) was given permission to extend her remarks in the RECORD and include an article.

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. RIEHLMAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

[Mr. RIEHLMAN addressed the House. His remarks appear in the Appendix of the RECORD.]

Mr. O'HARA of Minnesota. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Minnesota?

There was no objection.

[Mr. O'HARA of Minnesota addressed the House. His remarks appear in the Appendix of the RECORD.]

ALGER HISS

Mr. HUBER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio?

There was no objection.

Mr. HUBER. Mr. Speaker, I hold no brief for Alger Hiss or any other person who may be convicted of disloyalty to this great Government; however I would like to ask just who prosecuted and who convicted Alger Hiss? It was this Democratic administration.

The Republicans are so devoid of leadership and issues that they content themselves with hissing Hiss. If his conviction is sustained by the higher courts and he is eventually imprisoned, it will be no reflection on the President of the United States.

If it is found that Alger Hiss was disloyal to President Truman, we must remember that Benedict Arnold was disloyal to the Father of Our Country, George Washington.

DR. JAMES SHERA MONTGOMERY, CHAPLAIN, HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, I offer a resolution (H. Res. 453).

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That immediately following his resignation as Chaplain of the House of Representatives, James Shera Montgomery be, and he is hereby, appointed Chaplain emeritus of the House of Representatives, with salary at the basic rate of $2,350 per annum, payable monthly, to be paid out of the contingent fund of the House until otherwise provided by law.

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members who so desire may extend their remarks at this point in the RECORD, and I also ask unanimous consent that all Members may have five legislative days in which to extend their remarks in the RECORD on the subject of Dr. Montgomery.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, there is nothing so nice in life as to meet a person with a fine mind. A person's name is one of identification, a person's racial origin is a matter of accident of birth, a person's color is the accident of birth, and a person's religion is a matter of his own conscience. In my journey through life the accident of birth plays no part, in my opinion, of my fellow man. Difference of religion is one which I thoroughly respect, and all I ask is that others respect my right to my conscience and to my right to exercise of it. In my journey through life what I like to analyze is the minds of people that I meet, and when I meet a person with a nice mind he is nice, no matter what his name might be, and no matter what his racial origin might be, or his color, or religion.

One of the nicest men, one of the most influential minds constructively that I have met in my journey through life to date is our beloved chaplain, about to become our chaplain emeritus, Dr. James Shera Montgomery. I think it might well be said that he and Mrs. Montgomery have truly led a blessed life. Born 87 years ago, in 1862, 67 years a minister, an ambassador of God on earth; 30 years, short a few months, chaplain of this great body, he has left his imprint upon the mind of everyone who knew him in the past and who knows him now. Time passes, and in his life the time has arrived when the strain of active work can only be maintained by him under great difficulty and at the expense of his health.

You and I, recognizing the great man that he is, and the love that we have for him, the justification for our action will soon be to adopt unanimously the resolution that I have the honor to offer. You will note that he is chaplain emeritus; not chaplain in retirement. I might say that you will note that we are placing him in the chaplain emeritus status of this House with practically the full salary that he is now receiving; a justifiable consideration on our part.

I know that he and Mrs. Montgomery will derive great pleasure during the remaining years of their lives in the action of confidence that the House has evidenced by the adoption of this resolution. My hope and prayer is that God, in His infinite wisdom, will bless them both with many future years of happiness together. I know, no matter how long Dr. Montgomery lives, that he will be carrying on in that wonderful way of his; an inspiration to all whom he meets, doing to the maximum extent possible, in accordance with his faith and as a spiritual leader, the work of God on earth.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McCORMACK. I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. I join with my good friend, the distinguished majority leader, in support of this resolution. It is a resolution that tells of our esteem, our respect, and our admiration for a great man, a man who for years has taught the gospel of the Lord. His prayers here have been an inspiration to all of us who have been privileged to hear them. I am very happy to join in support of the resolution.

Mr. GRAHAM. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McCORMACK. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. GRAHAM. Mr. Speaker, to paraphrase the words of Abraham Lincoln, "Four score and seven years ago there was brought forth on this continent," today we can aptly apply those words to the birth of a man who has devoted himself to the spiritual leadership of this great legislative body. Hundreds of men have listened to him as his voice has been raised to Almighty God in supplication and in prayer.

Born during the fratricidal struggle in this great country, he has witnessed the most trying years of our national history. His faith has remained firm and steady, broad and tolerant. He has helped to inspire every man and woman who has come under the guidance of his leadership.

Now he retires to the quiet life of meditation and reflection and, under his own vine and fig tree, I know he will be comforted, inspired, and enheartened by the token of respect and esteem that is given him here today.

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McCORMACK. I yield to the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. COX. I do not believe that in the long history of this body there has been one who has labored here that has exercised so profound an influence for good upon his coworkers, his fellows, as has our sweet and gentle friend who now changes somewhat his relationship to this body.

Mr. Speaker, this good man has erected in the hearts of his associates an altar where each may worship. Wherever he goes or whatever he does, I believe it to be the desire of this House that the love of his fellows follow him. It is the prayer of all that the blessings of the Good Master continue to shower upon him.

Mr. JENKINS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McCORMACK. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. JENKINS. It was my privilege to know a little something about the preparation of this resolution. On behalf of all the Members of this House on both sides, I thank the distinguished leader on the Democratic side and the leader on the minority side and the Speaker, because these three men are entirely responsible for giving us an opportunity to do this fine thing that we are about to do—pass this resolution.

Mr. McCORMACK. I should like to include all the Members, because we are simply the conduit of the wishes of all the Members of the House. I appreciate the remarks made by my friend from Ohio, but I want the RECORD to show that the entire membership of the House were aware of or sensed that this event was going to happen, and they all concurred in it.

Mr. JUDD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McCORMACK. I yield to the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. JUDD. The distinguished majority leader has said there is nothing nicer than to meet a man with a nice mind. If there is anything nobler, it is a man with a fine spirit. Our beloved Chaplain is such a man. To me, the most impressive thing about him is not that he opened our sessions with inspiring prayers, which is the official and expected function of a chaplain, but that he has been a chaplain, in fact, to each one of us individually. The many associations and conversations we have had with him here on the floor and elsewhere have made as great a contribution to us personally and to the spirit of this body as have the beautiful prayers of adoration, aspiration, and devotion in which he has led us, challenging us and helping us to be the kind of Christian servants that the Representatives of this Christian Nation ought to be.

Mr. BREHM. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McCORMACK. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. BREHM. Dr. Montgomery lives in the same apartment building in which we reside. I have a few lines in mind which expresses my feelings toward Dr. Montgomery:

Oh, the comfort, the inexpressible comfort, of feeling safe with a person,
Having neither to weigh thoughts nor words,
But pouring them all right out, chaff and grain together,
Confident that a faithful hand will take them and sift them, keep what is worth keeping,
And with the breath of love and kindness blow the rest away.

Mr. PLUMLEY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McCORMACK. I yield.

Mr. PLUMLEY. Mr. Speaker, having twice had the very distinguished honor of nominating the gentleman to whom we pay our respective tributes today as retiring Chaplain of the House of Representatives, I say I have done it on both occasions with the genuine feeling that here is a man who preaches to us—who talks to us; who leads us by his example in that he says, "Do not do what I say, but do as I do."

That as we all of us always know he has everywhere exemplified. He was, has been, and always will be, as Pope has said, "a minister, but a man."

Mr. McCORMACK. In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, the road to eternal and earthly happiness is to live close to God and to follow and obey His law. Dr. and Mrs. Montgomery have lived a happy life on earth and, while I am not the Judge, I am sure their eternal life will be favorably acted upon. They have led a happy life because they have both lived close to God.

Mr. RAYBURN. Dr. Montgomery has been with us a long time, during which he has endeared himself to us all—a man of high character, splendid ability, a man of God, a great soul. I feel a deep personal loss in his going. May his days be happy ones and his path an easy one.

"SILENCE, A HARD ARGUMENT TO BEAT"

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Mr. Speaker, our gentle, lovable, helpful Chaplain, the Rev. James Shera Montgomery is to become our Chaplain Emeritus of the House of Representatives.

It is difficult to add to the fine tributes already spoken for his labors among us. As much as any minister I have ever known, he has fulfilled that prayer of St. Francis of Assisi:

Lord, make me an instrument of Thy peace;
Where there is hatred, let me sow love;
Where there is injury, pardon;
Where there is doubt, faith;
Where there is despair, hope;
Where there is darkness, light;
Where there is sadness, joy.

As has been mentioned, Dr. Montgomery's services as active Chaplain have not ended with the daily prayer that has opened sessions of the House. He has moved among us from day to day with a word of greeting, a word of cheer, a word of inspiration, friendly but never obtrusive.

I recall one day when the House was in a stormy mood. It was a question whether the debate was making votes or changing minds on either side of the issue that was up. Speeches were running toward personalities. Chaplain Montgomery happened to be seated beside me. I commented upon the fact that a certain member was holding himself pretty well under fire.

"My preacher father," Chaplain Montgomery remarked, "had a saying that went like this: 'Silence is a hard argument to beat.'"

I have been grateful for that observation many times.

"Silence is a hard argument to beat."

Mr. ARENDS. Mr. Speaker, I could not let this occasion pass without expressing my love and respect for our retiring Chaplain, Dr. James Shera Montgomery, who, for the past 29 years, has presided over this body as House Chaplain. As he retires, all of us wish for him real peace and contentment to which he is so greatly entitled, and that life will hold in store for both him and Mrs. Montgomery many, many enjoyable days together.

It is doubtful that Dr. Montgomery really understands just how great his influence has been over the many members of Congress who have been privileged to listen to his daily prayers. His prayers were always meaningful, sincere, and helpful. One of the things that has always attracted me to Dr. Montgomery has been the real glow of radiance on his face as he closed his eyes in prayer to Almighty God. One could understand and even visualize his nearness to the Master as the words came forth from the very depth of his heart. I might add that I hope it is not only my privilege but the privilege of all other Members of this House to live as near to their God as Dr. Montgomery has lived. Without doubt, there must today ring in the ears of the Chaplain the words of the Master when he said, "Well done, thou good and faithful servant."

Dr. Montgomery's service of 29 years to the House of Representatives is deeply appreciated by us all. I heartily join with all other Members in unanimous passage of the present resolution.

Mr. DAGUE. Mr. Speaker, it is my great privilege to join in the tribute that has been paid our beloved Chaplain and to herein set forth my deep personal appreciation of the inspiration and moral stimulus I have had from the guidance he has given us during my brief membership in this House.

In this day when material things are too often exalted to the exclusion of religious truth it has been good to have been able to start each day with a word of spiritual encouragement from this great man. That his prayers have been selective indicates the care with which he daily sought to fit his appeal for divine help to the problem at hand, and I am sure that no legislation has been enacted that is not better for having had written into it a portion of that human charity which he has so consistently recommended.

The life a man lives and the evidences of great character are the qualities which wield influence far beyond the power of the spoken word, and I am sure that all of us in the Congress are not only better public servants but are in fact better men for having had the opportunity to travel a part of this life's journey with this great Christian gentleman. May the God to whom he has shown such constant devotion continue to guide and protect him and his beloved helpmate as they relax from their labors and enjoy a bit of well-earned rest.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the resolution.

The resolution was unanimously agreed to.

RESIGNATION OF CHAPLAIN

The SPEAKER. The Chair lays before the House the following communication, which the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

JANUARY 30, 1950.

Hon. SAM RAYBURN,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SPEAKER: It is with regret that I submit herewith my resignation as Chaplain of the House, to take effect February 1. Due to the condition of my health this becomes necessary.

Allow me to assure you of my great appreciation of our long associations through these years; they will remain in my grateful memory while time passes by. The Congress will always be very near to my heart; may generous blessings of a loving Father abide with each and every Member, officer, and employee is my prayer.

Ever faithfully yours,
JAMES SHERA MONTGOMERY.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the resignation is accepted.

There was no objection.

ELECTION OF REV. BERNARD BRASKAMP AS CHAPLAIN

Mr. WALTER. Mr. Speaker, I offer a resolution (H. Res. 454).

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That Rev. Bernard Braskamp, of the District of Columbia, be, and he is hereby, chosen Chaplain of the House of Representatives.

The resolution was agreed to.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

COTTON AND PEANUT ACREAGE ALLOTMENTS AND MARKETING QUOTAS

Mr. COOLEY. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union for the further consideration of House Joint Resolution 398, relating to cotton and peanut acreage allotments and marketing quotas under the Agricultural Adjustment Act of 1938, as amended.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union for the further consideration of House Joint Resolution 398 with Mr. SMITH of Virginia in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

Mr. HOPE. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BROWN].

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks and to proceed out of order.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BROWN]?

There was no objection.

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, I have asked for this time and obtained unanimous consent to speak out of order because I feel it necessary, at the earliest possible moment, to correct some misinformation which has been given to the American people recently.

I refer to the reports which have been published in the public press of a speech made by one of my colleagues, the Honorable FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT, JR., in New York on Saturday night.

When I first read this report I was a little disturbed and perhaps a little irked and angry over it. At that time I thought that I should take the floor for perhaps a longer period.

I attempted to reach the gentleman from New York this morning to tell him I would take the floor today, and failed to find him at his office. I was told that I could reach him at Murray Hill 8-3200 in New York, about noon or this afternoon today. So, I have been unable to reach him to tell him that I was going to comment on his speech and this press article.

Then, a little later this morning, I discussed the whole matter with one of his colleagues and friends, who said to me, "Clarence, if I were you I would not let Junior's speech concern me too much. You should be big-hearted and magnanimous in your actions. You should realize that this young man has been in Congress only a short time; and that he has not been in attendance at too many sessions of the Congress and he has, therefore, not had the same opportunity to know just what goes on in the Congress that many of us have who are more regular in our attendance. So you should not be too critical of him, because perhaps he has obtained his information as to what is going on in the Congress in a second-hand way by reading warped reports in the papers, rather than through first-hand information in the Halls of Congress."

That gave me cause to stop and think. I realized, as the gentleman told me, there is grave concern among many of the friends of this fine young man, Mr. ROOSEVELT, over the fact that he is not here as much as they would like to see him. So I decided I had better check up to see whether that was a legitimate reason for not being too critical of him.

I checked this morning, and I find that on 129 roll calls in the House between the time he entered it and January 27, Mr. ROOSEVELT was absent on 69 roll calls, or failed to respond, and answered on only 60 roll calls; that on 65 roll calls on important measures in that period of time, he voted on only 30, and was absent 35 times when the roll was called, or at least failed to answer.

So I do not want to be too critical of the gentleman. I just want to set him right, if I may.

In his speech he commented on FEPC. Incidentally, he does not give the Republican Membership of the House, who voted the same way he did on the 21-day discharge rule, any credit whatsoever; therefore that was entirely a victory of his particular group within the Democratic Party, he claimed. I am sorry that the gentleman did so.

He saw fit to attack a former great Senator from Massachusetts, Henry Cabot Lodge, claiming that he torpedoed somebody or other in some administration or other. I cannot help but feel it was not in good taste for him to attack the dead. There have been times when I have had the urge to say some things about certain deceased persons, but I have resisted the impulse because of the feeling that it was an indelicate thing to do. I hope the gentleman will not do such a thing again.

Then he gets down to where he talks about me, and that is why I am here. I quote from the New York Times, which quotes him:

> Next, Senator TAFT's campaign manager, one Mr. CLARENCE BROWN of Ohio, who only the week before had pledged to the Civil Rights Mobilization Conference in Washington that he would vote FEPC out of the Rules Committee, forgot to practice what he preached and voted with four Dixiecrats only last Tuesday against the FEPC coming out of the Rules Committee.

Before I comment on that I should like to read the next sentence:

> Mr. ROOSEVELT referred only indirectly to his dispute with Representative ADAM CLAYTON POWELL, Jr.

There are several misstatements of fact in that report. I would like to advise the gentleman, and I am advising him here and now on the floor of the House, despite the fact that he is absent, only because I do not want to permit this misinformation to go further—that, first of all, I am not Senator TAFT'S campaign manager. I am a candidate myself out in Ohio; and while I am very strong for the Senator and am proud to say that in my opinion he will be reelected overwhelmingly next November, I am not his campaign manager. I hope, therefore, that the attempt to involve Senator TAFT in House activities will come to naught.

Second, I have never been called upon, or never had the opportunity to appear before the Civil Rights Mobilization Conference in Washington or anywhere else; and, therefore, I have made it no pledges. I have not, to my knowledge, received any letters, and I am sure that I have not personally answered any letters from this organization.

Then, I wish to call attention to the fact that the press of the country carried the story as to why I voted as I did against reporting FEPC from rules; and I am sure the gentleman from New York would not want a great moral issue such as FEPC brought to the floor of this House through subterfuge or trickery. I, as the ranking Republican member on the committee present that day, tried to protect two of my Republican associates on that committee in their right to be heard and their right to participate and their right to vote on that important question. The gentleman from New York failed to say that such had been explained on the floor and that I later had made a motion to reconsider so as to keep this FEPC bill alive for further consideration by the Rules Committee at an early date.

I think also he has failed to mention here that I have voted for a great deal of civil-rights legislation in the past and that I did vote to report a FEPC bill in a previous Congress, so as to send it to the floor. The gentleman should further understand that I have always reserved the right, not only on this FEPC bill, but on every other bill, to vote on it when it reaches the floor according to the dictates of my own conscience, and according to my own discretion and best judgment.

I hope the gentleman will stand corrected and that he will be just a little more careful in the future in referring to the actions taken by Members of this House.

In conclusion, if I may be permitted, let me speak just a few words of general political philosophy. I would like to say to all of the Members of the House that after 35 years of experience in public office and a long term of service in this House, I am convinced no one can learn the rules of procedure for this House in any New York night club. I am also convinced from my political experience, and I want to say this to all of you as good advice, that no one can solve any of these great social and legislative problems which confront us through nocturnal meditations on Fifty-second Street. We can solve them only by staying on the job right here.

Mr. COOLEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 9 minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. POAGE].

Mr. POAGE. Mr. Chairman, I hope the membership will bear with me for a few minutes so that I may get one or two fundamental problems involved in this legislation clearly before the House.

It has been suggested that this legislation is complicated and that it is technical. So it is as to the details. But the basic principles involved in this legislation are not complicated.

When we speak of farm legislation, most people think of what is known as the price-support program, which is not before the House today. The only question before the House today is the question of allocating acreage and production between the various growers of cotton and incidently to the growers of peanuts. It is solely a question of dividing the production that is to be allowed between those who are in the business of growing cotton. This bill does not involve price supports.

There are those who feel that the basic farm legislation—that is, price-support legislation—is solely for the benefit of farmers. They are wrong. Obviously the immediate effect of price support is to help the farmers but, clearly, it provides markets for the mills and factories and employment for the laboring man, thereby stabilizing the economy of the entire Nation; and it is upon that fact that we are justified in supporting such legislation.

We come then to the question of the allocation of cotton acreage. For whose benefit do we allocate acreage? Do we do it for the benefit of the cotton farmer? Why, certainly not. Every cotton farmer would be delighted if he could grow all he could plant to cotton and get a good price for it. We limit the acreage a farmer may plant to cotton. We limit the acreage of peanuts or of any other farm crop primarily for the benefit of the taxpayer. That is who we are trying to protect in all acreage-limitation legislation. Acreage allotments and marketing quotas are primarily for the benefit of the American taxpayer, not primarily for the benefit of any farmer or group of farmers. They are imposed so that there may be a reasonable limitation upon the obligation of the Government under the support program which is so essential to our entire economic welfare. So when we come to you with a program to limit the production of any farm crop, remember that we are not coming as special pleaders for farmers, but as advocates of moderation in the expenditure of public funds.

We came to you last summer with a proposal to limit the production of cotton from more than 27,000,000 acres, actually planted last year, so that it could not exceed 21,000,000 acres in the year of 1950. That is a substantial reduction.

At the same time we provided a substantial reduction in legal maximum, because had we not passed that bill last summer the law as it then stood, provided that the Secretary of Agriculture could not cut the cotton acreage below about 27,400,000 acres. So we cut 6,400,000 acres off of the legal maximum cotton acreage that the farmers of the United States could grow. That is a very substantial cut. If you will think in terms of industry—of cutting General Motors by any such percentage, or cutting the wages of any great group of workers in this country by any such percentage, you will readily appreciate the tremendous cut that has been given the production of the cotton farmers of this Nation. And this cut in production came along with a declining market, because remember that the price of cotton has gone down. Remember that the parity price of cotton has gone down and as parity goes down the support price goes down. The actual market price of cotton has already dropped approximately 25 percent in the last 3 years, and now the cotton farmer is taking a cut in production of approximately that amount. Surely everybody must agree that the cotton farmer is paying a rather high price for his price support. Very few other farmers take any such reduction in return for the support of their prices. No group of workers take such a cut in their hours of employment in return for their minimum wage. Surely in view of the sacrifices that the cotton farmer is making to justify the price-support program, no fair-minded citizen would want the acreage allotments or the marketing quotas on cotton to be unfair or inequitable. If the operation of the law either through defects in its drafting or its administration results in an injustice to some farmers, I am sure that every Member of this House would want to correct those injustices just as far as we can.

Certainly we did not write a perfect law, I am sure; neither was it administered by supermen. It was administered by ordinary men just like you and I, and it did result in many inequities. In my own State a large part of the injustice resulted from what I consider to be a misinterpretation of the law we wrote. I speak as one representing the great State of Texas that has more than one-third of the total cotton acreage of America. In that State, through some kind of fumbling—I do not want to charge anybody with anything more serious; therefore I say through somebody's fumbling—there was imposed a formula that no one had thought could be imposed; which the subcommittee had been assured would not be imposed, but it was imposed after 10,000 acres of cotton were snatched out of clear air and added to our 1948 acreage so as to allegedly bring us 93 acres—93 out of 10,300,000 more acres under the formula known as the California gadget. Texas, a third of cotton-producing America, was arbitrarily placed under this formula which denies to our State all credit for the war crops our farmers had grown, in reliance on the promise of our Government to count such crops as cotton.

During the war the Government asked farmers who would otherwise have been required to go back into cotton to hold their allotments, not to plant cotton but instead to plant crops which were considered to be of greater immediate value to the war effort. These were known as war crops. This Congress by what is known as Public Law 12 promised the farmers that if they would stay out of cotton, they would lose no advantage in future years. The shift from cotton to war crops was particularly heavy through a great strip of Texas extending from the Gulf coast to the Red River and embracing particularly the country known as the Redlands, the Blacklands, the Cross Timbers, and the South Texas Prairies. The bill we passed last fall made specific provisions for credit for these war crops. I had insisted on that.

It also had a provision which stated that "notwithstanding any other provision of law," the Secretary should give each county credit for all of the war crops grown in the county. I think this provision clearly prevailed over any gadget or formula, but the Department held otherwise and held that Texas was entitled to no credit. We do not contend that our State is entitled to any more acres. We realize that the acres already allotted us are substantially the same from a State-wide standpoint as the acres we would receive had the law been properly interpreted, but it makes a tremendous difference as to where those acres go within the State. Had the counties that shifted to war crops been given credit for their production, there would have been a much more even distribution of cotton over the State. As it is, there are counties in Texas that have a factor as small as 1.6 percent. That means farmers in these counties can plant only 1.6 acres in cotton out of each hundred acres they have in cultivation. There are something like 50 counties in the State that have a factor less than 10 percent. That means that in these counties nobody can afford to grow cotton. There are probably 25 counties, possibly a few less, that have county factors of more than 50 percent. That means that in these favored counties anyone who is a cotton grower can put more than half of his land in cotton and must follow cotton with cotton in order to plant his allotment.

Mr. COOLEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. POAGE. I yield to the gentleman from North Carolina.

Mr. COOLEY. The gentleman, of course, is talking about the quota law of 1949 which this resolution seeks to remedy.

Mr. POAGE. That is right.

Mr. COOLEY. I would like to ask the gentleman if it is not a fact that under this resolution the situation complained of would be substantially alleviated and hardships will be prevented.

Mr. POAGE. I think if this resolution passes as it is brought before this House, and with the amendments that might be desirable, that it will give very substantial relief, and it is for that reason that I urge you to support this resolution which will, in the first place, assure to every cotton farmer 70 percent of his average plantings for the basic 3 years, 1946, 1947, and 1948. The resolution now also provides that every cotton farmer will get 50 percent of the highest acreage he planted in any 1 of those 3 years. I hope that we would be well advised to eliminate that, not that I would like to eliminate it, but because I feel that we must keep the acreage added by this bill just as low as possible. This is a bill to relieve hardship, not a bill to enable people to make substantial money. We must keep it as low as possible, else we cannot expect to receive widespread support. It is for that reason that we have limited the new acreage authorized by this measure to 40 percent of a man's tilled acres, under any circumstances.

Mr. PACE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. POAGE. I yield to the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. PACE. I would like to add to what the distinguished gentleman from Texas has stated, that not only was there no intention on the part of our committee or any member of our committee that the so-called Memphis agreement or California gadget would apply to his State, but both the gentleman from Texas and I had been assured that that would not be done.

Mr. POAGE. That is exactly right. We had positive assurance that Texas would not fall under that formula, but they turned right around and brought us under that formula.

I again direct your attention to the provisions of the bill. This bill provides that each cotton farmer may have at least 70 percent of his average plantings during the base period, not to exceed 40 percent of his total tilled acres. This 40-percent provision is a limitation on our generosity. It is to protect the taxpayers by making sure that this bill will not be used to do more than relieve those now suffering with unfair allotments. It is written in the same words we used under the old law. This wording was in the law in 1938 and remained there till 1949. We put them back as a limitation to protect the taxpayer, not to protect the farmer, but to see to it that the man who must pay the bill will not be called upon to support an unreasonably large acreage. We ask only that those farmers who have been seriously discriminated against, those farmers who have been cut so low that they cannot stay in business, be given an opportunity to have just a minimum to stay in business. We are not asking that anybody make any substantial money out of this bill.

This resolution does not take any acres away from anybody, and it does not propose to give any acres to anybody except those who are now suffering, who have taken a cut of more than 30 percent of their average plantings, and we believe that that is not asking too much of a reasonable House. We should pass it with all dispatch. Impossible as it may seem to some of my northern colleagues, cotton planting has already begun in the lower valley of Texas. We should act at once.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. HOPE. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HOFFMAN].

UNIFICATION, THE NAVY AIR POWER, AND THE MARINE CORPS

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, the attention of the House is called to an article of vital interest to all those who desire to understand some of the issues underlying the current conflicts over our national military policies.

The article to which reference is made was printed in the Appendix to the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, Volume 95, Page A6266, under the extension of remarks of the Honorable CLARK W. THOMPSON, of Texas, entitled "Sea Power and a National General Staff," and written by Lt. Col. J. D. Hittle, United States Marine Corps. The article first appeared in the October issue of the Naval Institute Proceedings. Because it was carried in an issue of the RECORD just prior to adjournment, there were many who probably missed it. Permit me to call your attention to this article and commend it to your attention, for I consider it one of the most significant studies of the problem of top-level direction of our armed forces that has yet appeared.

This article is of unusual interest and importance as it sets forth the reasons why adoption of a national—or supreme—general staff system would lead to inevitable disaster in our country. With careful attention to historical fact, the author relates the manner in which the supreme general staff of Germany served as the means by which the Army and the Air Force were able to combine their efforts to bring about the destruction of German sea power. It will not take any imagination on the part of the reader to see that there is a clearly discernable similarity between what happened to the German Navy under a supreme general staff and what many thoughtful persons contend is happening to United States naval power at the present time when the naval element almost invariably is in the minority position where issues arise in a meeting of the Joint Chiefs of Staff.

Readers will also find much food for thought in the author's careful explanation of how a supreme general staff system in this country will mean the end of a naval air arm and the end of a Marine Corps capable of carrying out the duties assigned to those elements by Congress in the National Security Act of 1947. Although a national general staff has been and still is strongly supported by some high Army and Air Force persons, the House of Representatives has traditionally and, in my opinion, correctly rejected such proposals for establishing a Prussian-type national general staff, as such an agency would be alien to our democratic form of government and unresponsive to our requirements of national security. After reading this article, it would seem that Members of the House will feel a deep satisfaction in the realization that it was largely through the efforts of the House that the National Security Act of 1947 and the amendments in 1949 pointedly rejected the Prussian-derived proposals of those who would impose such a politically dangerous and militarily inefficient staff system on our Nation. Also, after reading this article, I hope that Members will find reason to be more determined than ever to ascertain whether or not our defense officials are actually at the present time proceeding with the development of a de facto national general staff in violation of the specific provisions of the National Security Act. That such a supreme general staff is now being developed would seem to be a logical interpretation of the testimony of certain high officers before the Armed Services Committee during its hearings last October.

There is another reason why this article is of more than passing interest. Lt. Col. J. D. Hittle, United States Marine Corps, is unusually qualified to write about a national general staff system, as he is a widely recognized military historian and writer. Among his works is the standard text on staff history, a book entitled "The Military Staff—Its History and Development."

Nor can Sea Power and a National General Staff be brushed aside—as many would like to do—as an oblique attack on unification. In the first place, the article pointedly supports the action of this Congress in its decision to prohibit the establishment of a supreme staff system. In taking such a stand, the author is helping explain why members of Congress were correct in their insistence on such provisions in the National Security Act. Such an attitude on the part of a professional military man is a reassuring discovery, particularly at the present time when there is unremitting pressure to have Congress abandon our war-proven American-developed military concepts, substituting therefor the inferior ideas and methods of our defeated enemies.

It was my privilege to be chairman of the House Committee on Expenditures in Executive Departments at the time that committee was charged with writing the National Security Act of 1947. As former chairman of that committee I can say that I know of no other person in the armed forces who worked harder or who contributed more than did Lieutenant Colonel Hittle to the cause of constructive unification of the armed forces. And by constructive unification I mean that kind of unification we hoped for in passing the National Security Act of 1947, a unification that would bring genuine economy and efficiency under a system that would be in complete harmony with our form of government and our peculiar security requirements, a kind of unification that would be characterized by all elements of the armed services willingly accepting the decision of Congress as to the functions each would perform in making its contribution to a more effective national security. Constructive unification did not mean the kind of a so-called unification that would be used as the instrument for effecting the destruction of our balanced naval power based upon strong naval aviation and a powerful Marine Corps capable of discharging the functions assigned by Congress in the National Security Act of 1947; nor did it mean the kind of a unification that would lead to eventual establishment of a de facto national general staff.

For these reasons, and many more, the article, Sea Power and a National General Staff, is again committed to the attention of all members of the House.

Mr. HOPE. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN].

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. I will be glad to yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. TABER. I am wondering how it happens that the Committee on Agriculture brings out a bill of this enormous size without any published hearings that might be available to the membership during its consideration?

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. I will yield to the chairman of my committee for an explanation.

Mr. COOLEY. I shall be very glad to explain it.

We regard this as emergency legislation, due to the fact that cotton planting time is near at hand. Had we taken the time to have extended hearings we probably could not have gotten it passed in time to be of any benefit. We did extend an invitation to every Member of Congress to come to the committee room for the purpose of discussing proposed changes in the quota law.

There was no real demand from any farm organization to appear, because apparently all farm organization men know and did know that this law had resulted in many inequities.

May I say to the gentleman that in the consideration of the quota law of 1949 perhaps more consideration was given to that one bill than any other bill that has been before the committee in a decade. The gentleman who is now addressing the House was a member of the subcommittee and I am sure will substantiate the statement I have just made. Nothing could have been accomplished by holding hearings, because I think we had all the information before us that was needed.

Mr. TABER. The thing that disturbs me more about it is that the rule was granted on Thursday and the bill was taken up on Friday. If the hearings had been sent to the Government Printing Office on Thursday they would have been available on Friday.

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. As I recollect it, no reporters were present to make a transcript of the testimony that was given to the committee.

Mr. Chairman, I am very much distressed to be forced into a position where I must oppose this legislation. I voted against the reporting of the bill in the committee and I am opposing the bill now. I am disturbed, nevertheless, because I have been on the committee a good long time, I have worked with the gentleman from the cotton areas, and I have generally concurred in all of the proposals and ideas they have had for legislative consideration with reference to cotton and the other commodities.

I do not think there is a single man on the committee from the cotton areas who will get up and say now that for the last 23 years I have ever opposed any cotton legislation they have proposed in the committee. If there is a Representative from the cotton area who will now say that I have opposed him in the committee or on the floor on cotton proposals, I would like to hear it.

Mr. WORLEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. WORLEY. I doubt if anyone can say that, but we think that is too good a record for the gentleman to break this late in the game.

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. I thank the gentleman, who is not only a distinguished Member but has the reputation of being the handsomest man in the House of Representatives. I have high regard for him.

There is such a thing as an individual or group of individuals having their cake and eating it too. That is what we are running into in this legislation. The Committee will be interested in knowing that we have approximately 21,300,000 bales of cotton on hand. That is the cotton report issued by the Department of Agriculture to be released today. Approximately 8,000,000 bales of cotton are used in domestic consumption. It is estimated that 5,000,000 bales of cotton will be exported. I think that figure is a little high. But that makes 13,000,000 bales. That leaves approximately 8,000,000 bales for a carry-over into the next crop year. Officials of the Department of Agriculture appeared before our committee and stated that the production of cotton for 1950 should be on an acreage of between 16,000,000 and 18,000,000 acres, instead of 27,000,000 acres which was the acreage in 1949. I was on the cotton subcommittee. We sat for weeks and weeks on this cotton-quota law to determine—in other words to let the cotton boys write the cotton-quota law. I sat there and agreed with them. They had a lot of difficulty in agreeing amongst themselves, but they finally agreed that instead of having the 18 million acres recommended by the Department of Agriculture they would raise the ante so that there would be 21,000,000 acres for the 1950 cotton crop. Now they come before the House and ask to have that increased by 1,500,000 acres. That will give you a total of 22,500,000 acres, which is a reduction of only four and a half million acres or so from the acreage last year. The additional acreage will produce between eight hundred and nine hundred thousand bales of cotton additional.

Mind you, we are going to have about 8,000,000 bales of cotton in this country as a carry-over. The Department of Agriculture estimates that they will have in the current year approximately 6,000,000 bales under Government ownership and loan. Then we will go to work and raise a large crop in 1950. If we have the same weather conditions as we had last year or if they produce, let us say, an average of 300 pounds to the acre, that will give a total of 13,500,000 bales of cotton for 1950. Then you add the 8,000,000 bales carry-over and you still have 21,500,000 bales in the 1950–51 crop. So, you are just exactly where you were to start with.

The extra 8,000,000 bales of cotton will be in the hands of the United States Government. We have enough on hand so that they would not have to plant more than ten or twelve million acres of cotton this year to take care of the exports and safe domestic requirements.

This year we have a 90 percent of parity support price for cotton. That also goes for wheat and other basic commodities. This is the last year we will have 90 percent of parity support for cotton under the old formula because with the tremendous supplies we now have on hand and with what will be produced in the coming crop year, parity will go to 80 percent of parity under the old formula for the 1951 crop unless we pass legislation to revise it.

Therefore, this increase in acreage will mean that the Government will be the owner of at least 8,000,000 or 9,000,000 bales of cotton which some people, of course, think is the proper thing to do. The Government's investment in this cotton will be around $1,200,000,000.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Minnesota has expired.

Mr. HOPE. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman three additional minutes.

Mr. CARROLL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. I will be glad to yield to the gentleman from Colorado.

Mr. CARROLL. In view of the colloquy between the gentleman from Minnesota and the gentleman from New York about there being no hearings, I would like to know whether or not the Department of Agriculture has issued a report on this bill.

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. I understand that the Secretary of Agriculture wrote a four-page letter, that I have not had an opportunity to see. The only letter I saw was a letter that appeared in the paper, from the Secretary to Mr. Klein, accusing Mr. Klein or the Farm Bureau of writing the cotton-quota law of last year. I take issue with that, because I sat on the cotton subcommittee, and I think our chairman will bear me out that the cotton-quota law was written by members of the Committee on Agriculture, who were interested in cotton production.

Mr. COOLEY. I agree with the gentleman entirely.

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. So the Farm Bureau did not have a thing to do with writing the law, although the Secretary says that Mr. Klein, of the Farm Bureau Federation, wrote the law. The Committee on Agriculture wrote that cotton-quota law—after the members on the committee from the cotton area composed their differences and wrote the quota provisions of the cotton-quota law of 1949, which we are now told is not satisfactory. The small farmers, by and large, have gotten their quotas, but there has been a larger cotton acreage in some areas which produce a substantial portion of the cotton.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Minnesota has again expired.

Mr. HOPE. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman three additional minutes.

Mr. McCARTHY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. I yield.

Mr. McCARTHY. The statement has been made that the need for this legislation is due to the failure of administration of the other act. Who was responsible for the mismanagement? Can the gentleman answer that?

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. Well, I do not know. It has been rumored around that the act has not been administered according to the intent of Congress. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. LYLE], who made the statement on the rule the other day, made that statement. I do not like to say anything about the Secretary of Agriculture and his men in the Department. They are probably trying to do the best job they can, but I am satisfied that if they would carry out the act of 1949 according to the intent of Congress, and according to the intent that we had in the Committee on Agriculture, there would be no need for this legislation today.

Now, I just want to say another word about cotton. In all the years that I have been a member of the Committee on Agriculture I have wanted to keep the cotton farmers prosperous. I have taken the same attitude toward the tobacco farmers, the wheat and the corn farmers, but we have not had the same consideration from gentlemen who are representing those areas as we have accorded to them. I refer in particular to the devastating damage that they have done to the great dairy industry of this country, where we have several million dairy farmers who are literally being put out of business. We are cut down on our dairy products market in the country. We are hemmed in through that great-Midwestern area. With a cut in the corn acreage and with a cut in the wheat acreage and not being able to produce cotton or tobacco in our area, we just cannot produce anything. So I hope that my friends from the South, who may be somewhat critical of me because I am taking the position that I am today in opposition to this legislation, will have a little more consideration for our great dairy industry, rather than try to hog everything for themselves. They know they are in a business that is gradually going out of business, and I have every sympathy for them. I want to have a proper workable agricultural program in this country. I want to do my part for the cotton farmers of the United States, and I will do that whether we have a Democratic administration or a Republican administration. I ask the same consideration from them when they consider agriculture in other areas.

Mr. ARENDS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. ARENDS. I would like to ask the chairman of the committee a question with respect to corn. If in the commercial corn area where we face an anticipated reduction in acreage of approximately 20 percent whether the reduction will be on a percentage basis such as is being done here?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Minnesota has again expired.

Mr. HOPE. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman two additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota is recognized for two additional minutes.

Mr. COOLEY. I may say to the gentleman from Illinois that the same proposition was brought up and considered by the committee before this resolution was reported. Certainly, the gentleman knows that I cannot speak for the House Committee on Agriculture, but I may say for myself that if it becomes necessary for legislation to be enacted which will enable the corn growers to cope with the situation—and I believe I speak for other members of the committee likewise—that we will consider the matter immediately, just as we did with regard to wheat. We first had a provision in this resolution dealing with wheat; and when the resolution was introduced by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. HOPE] I immediately appointed a subcommittee, and the problems facing the wheat farmers are now being considered by a subcommittee. I would expect to do the same think if a similar situation arose with regard to the corn farmers.

Mr. JENSEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. I yield.

Mr. JENSEN. Is it not a fact that a death blow was struck at the buying power of the hog farmer, the dairy farmer, and the poultry farmer when the last agricultural bill was passed? And also when the oleo bill was passed? This reduces the buying power for cotton goods which the South is so much interested in.

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. There is no question about that.

Mr. JENSEN. And so we are likely to have a carry-over even higher than the gentleman from Minnesota expects?

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. The carry-over, whatever it is, will go into the hands of the Government and there is where it will be, excepting the amount that is exported and will be paid for by the American people and given away to other countries through the ECA.

Mr. HOEVEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. I yield.

Mr. HOEVEN. I am glad the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ARENDS] propounded the question he did to the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. COOLEY], chairman of the Committee on Agriculture, as to just what treatment we might expect if problems arise as to the corn acreage allotment or even the soybean acreage allotment. Let me confirm what the chairman stated here on the floor of this House, that if such problems arise, the Committee on Agriculture, according to my understanding, will give such problems immediate consideration. Am I correct?

Mr. COOLEY. The gentleman is entirely correct.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Minnesota has again expired.

Mr. COOLEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. GATHINGS].

Mr. HOLIFIELD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. GATHINGS. I yield for a brief question.

Mr. HOLIFIELD. I wish to ask the chairman of the committee if we are to understand by this colloquy that this is just the prelude to bringing in bills which will increase the corn acreage and the wheat acreage as well as the cotton acreage?

Mr. COOLEY. Certainly not. The Members on that side were addressing themselves a moment ago to the question of a reduction in corn acreage rather than an increase.

Mr. HOLIFIELD. It is not confined to wheat?

Mr. COOLEY. No; the increase involved in this bill resulted from inequities which came about through the law we passed in 1949.

Mr. HOLIFIELD. We are not to expect then, that this is a prelude to additional corn acreage and additional wheat acreage?

Mr. HOEVEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GATHINGS. I yield.

Mr HOEVEN. So there will be no mistake let me say that as far as the corn area is concerned the corn acreage allotment program has not as yet been broken down to the county and township levels. We do not know at this moment whether we are going to have any problems or not, perhaps not; but if we do, it is the understanding that such problems will have the immediate consideration of the Committee on Agriculture.

Mr. GATHINGS. Mr. Chairman, my good friend from Minnesota, and he is a good friend of mine, the gentleman who next to the former chairman of the committee, the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. HOPE], is the ranking member of the committee, left the impression with this group that there is a great amount of surplus cotton on hand today. He estimated that there would be 8,000,000 bales of cotton on hand on August 1, 1950. The gentleman's estimate is correct. There are expected to be on hand on July 31, the start of a new year, 8,021,000 bales of cotton.

Mr. Chairman, I call attention to page 14 of the House report where you will see what the cotton carry-over is in various years. In 1938, at the time that the Agricultural Adjustment Act was passed, there was a carry-over of 11,533,000 bales; in 1939, 13,033,000 bales; in 1940, 10,564,000 bales; and 1941, 12,166,000 bales. So by looking at this report it can be readily ascertained that the 8,000,000-bale estimate on August 1, 1950, would not be an excessive carry-over because we went into the war in 1941 with a carry-over of 12,166,000 bales.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GATHINGS. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. KEATING. But in those figures we are showing a decrease in the carry-over, which the gentleman, I am sure, will agree is a desirable trend?

Mr. GATHINGS. Yes. May I say to the gentleman that in the bill we passed in the first session of the Eighty-first Congress we provided that acreage will be limited in 1951 to that number of acres estimated by the Department of Agriculture, which would result in the production of 1,000,000 bales less than the domestic consumption plus exports for that year. So in future years we would deduct 1,000,000 bales from the carry-over each time under the law now on the statute books, which is most reasonable and proper.

Let me call attention to why we are here. The chairman of the Committee on Agriculture called us to Washington on the 12th day of December for the purpose of doing something about these inequities that exist. What were these inequities? Here they are. I hold in my hand some letters. Here is a man who says he has 261 acres of cropland, and he gets 30 acres of cotton. Here is a man who has 160. He gets only 32 acres of cotton to earn a livelihood. Here is another letter from a man who has 12 acres on one farm and 59 acres on another in cultivation. He gets 5 acres of cotton. Here is another small farmer who says he had planted 50 acres in 1946 to cotton, 55 acres in 1947, and 63 acres in 1948. He is given 5 acres of cotton. Here is another letter from a man who has a 160-acre farm. One hundred and ten acres of cotton were planted in 1949, 100 acres in 1948, 95 acres in 1947. He is given an allotment of 36.2 acres. Here is a letter from a large farmer who has 1,001 acres of cotton. That was in 1947. In 1948 he had 1,030 acres and in 1949, 1,150 acres. He gets an allotment of 485 acres, a reduction of about 70 percent. These low allotments are the result of the percent of cropland approach to the problem and, further, because the county committees did not reserve enough of the 15-percent reserve to remedy these hardships. I hope this resolution is passed with a minimum of delay.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Arkansas has expired.

Mr. COOLEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. JONES].

Mr. JONES of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, may I call attention to the statement on page 2 of the report that it never was the intention of the Congress that any inequities, no matter how small, should result from the application of the cotton-quota law. The purpose of this resolution is to authorize insofar as possible action to remedy these inequities.

The gentleman from Minnesota made the statement a minute ago that if Public Law 272 had been administered according to the intent of Congress there would be no need for this legislation. I think by that statement he has admitted that there is a need for this legislation.

I am in favor of controlled acreage for our cotton. I realize that we must have a reduction in acreage. If I thought that this resolution would permit an acreage which would exceed the 21,000,000 acres authorized by the Secretary of Agriculture, in conformity with Public Law 272, I would not want to support this resolution.

I do know that there is a need to adjust the inequities that have come about through the administration of Public Law 272. I do know that under the administration of that law—and it was not the intent of Congress—that we have allocated to many farmers in my district, as well as in all the cotton districts throughout the United States, acreage that is not going to be used. I do think that with this resolution which we will vote on here that there will be an opportunity for a reallocation and for those acres to be used by the farmers who need them very badly.

Most every Member has indicated here the great reduction that has been taken by farmers; in many cases a 70-percent reduction. We know that the statement was made that we expected a national reduction of 23 percent of their acreage from last year. We do know, and I have it in my district, that farmers are being cut more than 60 to 70, and in some cases having a cut of 80 percent. Now, that was not the intent of Congress. We can largely correct most of these inequities by adopting House Joint Resolution 398.

No doubt, when it is in order, various amendments will be offered to this resolution. While many of us might not agree entirely with the percentage figures and some of the other minor provisions which have been included in this resolution, and would favor some of the provisions which were omitted from the original Cooley amendment, I think we must appreciate the fact that at least a majority of the members of the Committee on Agriculture have agreed on the provisions which are included in this proposal and which I am willing to accept in the belief that it will not only clarify but will serve to implement the intent of the original legislation which is now Public Law 272.

I realize it is confusing to Members who are not familiar with the problems which exist in a cotton-producing area to understand why all the Representatives from cotton-producing districts are not in entire agreement on legislation which will correct the inequities which are being brought to your attention. Suffice to say the problems are not identical in every State. In fact, it would be practically impossible for the farmers in any one county to agree on a formula which would serve their individual purposes 100 percent. By the referendum vote last December an overwhelming majority of the cotton farmers have indicated their approval of a cotton-allotment and marketing-quota program in order to enjoy the benefits of price supports, and generally speaking, I believe that an overwhelming majority realize that we must limit the 1950 planting to an acreage which will not exceed 21,000,000 acres. I believe that the legislation which we are considering here today will accomplish this goal.

I want to also call this to your attention, that a lot of people do not want to help the big planter. I am not here talking for the big planter. I am talking for those renters and sharecroppers who are living on these big plantations. I have one friend who has about 79 families living on his farm. These people are renters. That man has been planting about 80 to 90 percent of his acreage in cotton. However, he is in a county which has had a comparatively small percentage of the total county acreage in cotton, and the percentage in that county is only 16 percent, which means that there will be approximately 50 families on that 1 plantation who are going to be dislocated and who will have to try to seek some other place on which to live, and that is going to be hard to find, because they are cotton farmers.

I am in favor of a controlled acreage. I am in favor of reducing the national acreage, but I do say that this law is necessary to correct the inequities which presently exist.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Missouri has expired.

Mr. HOPE. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. WORLEY].

Mr. WORLEY. Mr. Chairman, I was distinctly surprised and very sorry to hear my good friend, the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN] say that he was going to oppose this bill.

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WORLEY. I yield to the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. I think the gentleman was in the committee when we had the vote on it, and I think he will say that I voted against it.

Mr. WORLEY. The gentleman is correct; the gentleman voted against it, but I thought by this time he would have seen the error of his ways.

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. And I did so with a great deal of reluctance because of my great admiration for the gentleman from Texas and his associates.

Mr. WORLEY. I appreciate those words very much.

Mr. Chairman, this is not a perfect bill by any means. There is no way in the world, and there are not enough brains in the Committee on Agriculture or in the House or in the Department of Agriculture to write a bill which will be completely equitable and fair to all sections and all growers of the cotton industry. In fact, there is no way in the world that you can write a bill that is going to be perfect so long as it involves, as it must necessarily do, an acreage reduction.

Experience has shown that the first bill passed by the Congress was not perfect, but it certainly was not because the Subcommittee on Cotton, so ably headed by the distinguished gentleman from Georgia [Mr. PACE], did not do its utmost in the consideration of the bill. That group worked for many weeks hearing witness after witness. All who wanted to be heard had the opportunity. This bill now before us is not perfect. For example, I have 28 counties in my congressional district, about 15 of which grow cotton. Although this bill will add approximately 34,000 acres to those 15 counties, at the same time at least 4 of those counties have stated repeatedly that the only way we could care for their problem would be to allow 10,000 acres additional to each one of those counties. If you allot 10,000 acres additional for each of 15 counties, you allot 150,000 new acres. If exception were made in this instance then every other county in the country would be entitled to the same consideration.

We must keep the amount of cotton acreage as low as we can keep it, and still be as fair to all cotton growers as we can be, without running the risk of bankrupting the Government. Ninety-one percent of the people who grow cotton in this country said they were willing to trust the Government to work out the fairest program possible. They said in effect that in exchange for price supports they would be willing to accept acreage allotments and trust our Government to work out as fair a program as could be devised.

This legislation on cotton is just a forerunner of what is going to come in connection with corn-acreage allotments, wheat-acreage allotments, and all other acreage-allotment problems in connection with other agricultural commodities enjoying price supports. In the original cotton-acreage-allotment bill we attempted to put the administration as close to home as it was possible to place it. I do not say the fault was entirely in the act itself or in the administration of the act. It seems to me it was a combination of both.

May I say in conclusion, Mr. Chairman, that I deeply regret to see the distinguished subcommittee chairman, the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. PACE], retire from Congress. In about 9 years of service in this body I have never seen anyone who worked harder, not only on cotton, but on all other agricultural bills, than the gentlemen from Georgia. I know he worked himself virtually to the point of exhaustion on this particular measure. I hope that his constituents will not let him quit, but will send him back for many years to come.

Mr. COOLEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CAMP].

Mr. CAMP. Mr. Chairman, I am one of those who early saw that the operation of the act which we passed last fall was going to be most disastrous to that whole section of the cotton South where the first cotton was planted in this country and where the cotton gin itself was invented.

For instance, in my district one of the counties of which leads the State of Georgia in the production of cotton—it is always either first, second, or third in the State—is a county in which the average size farm is less than 50 acres. These farmers plant considerably more than half of their land to cotton. They cannot plant peanuts. That right was taken away from them in the Peanut Act. There is no other crop to which they can turn except poultry and dairying in a small way, which they have done.

In the summer, when I was at home, I went to the Farm Bureau meetings. These men were anxious and earnest. They asked me what was going to happen. Were the price guaranties going to continue, the price-support program? I said, "Yes; it will, if the farmers of this country vote crop control." "Well, how much reduction do they suggest that we make in 1950?" I said, "They tell me around 23 percent." So when the election was held 91 percent of the cotton farmers of this country voted for these controls. Now they confront me with the result of that law. Many of them have been cut 60 percent in their acreage.

Mr. BECKWORTH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CAMP. I yield.

Mr. BECKWORTH. Has the gentleman undertaken to find out how many additional acres will go in each of the counties in his district under the terms of this resolution?

Mr. CAMP. I understand that some of the counties in Georgia, where they planted what they call war crops, will get more cotton acreage than they had last year. Here is the whole trouble in the law. Please listen to me. I am pleading here for small farmers and in many instances small colored tenant farmers. The last day I was in Georgia a friend called up and said he had a tenant that he felt should be taken care of. He had been with him for 18 years. He was loyal and honest. He did not have enough cotton acreage to give him any land to work. He asked me if I could help him.

I moved him onto my farm and put him in a vacant house that I had there. This thing is serious. I do not worry so much about the big farmer. He can cut his acreage and do something else with his land. That is not going to hurt him too much. But I am talking about the small farmers now. They have divided the acreage all right on the basis of the State. The State of Georgia gets as much cotton as she should plant. They have allocated it to the counties all right. My county, Coweta County, had 26,830 acres in 1948 and it has about that many acres for this year. But here is the trouble. They do not allot this acreage on a historical basis. They allot it to the land. Hundreds of these farms have changed from cotton lands to pasture lands. Many of them have been fenced in and they are in grass now. They give the owner of such land, let us say, 12 or 15 acres, to plant in cotton. He does not want to plant any cotton and does not intend to plant any cotton and he will not plant any. I went into a store in Georgia recently to make a purchase just before I left. The man said, "Do you want to plant my cotton acreage?" I said, "I cannot if I wanted to. You cannot transfer it." He said, "I do not know why they gave it to me. They gave me 20 acres here and I did not plant any at all last year or the year before."

This amendment will permit these people to turn their cotton allotment into the committee and have it redistributed. There is only one question about it. You know these bills have too many ifs, ands, and buts and provisos in them. They have one here which provides that no man can plant more than 40 percent of his farm in cotton. If you have a man down there with 20 acres of land and he has been planting 16 acres in cotton, under this provision he could not get but 8 if somebody wanted to give them to him.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Georgia has expired.

Mr. HOPE. Mr. Chairman, I yield 1 minute to the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. CAMP. Mr. Chairman, in closing, I want to say I favor this amendment, but there will be an amendment offered to strike out that 40-percent provision. Let us strike it out. It is not going to hurt the general purpose of the resolution, and it will help these little people that I am pleading for here today.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Georgia has again expired.

Mr. COOLEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield such time as he may desire to the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. HARRIS].

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. Chairman, as so many of us have emphasized since the opening of this session of Congress, it is imperative that the Cotton Acreage Allotment and Marketing Quota Act be amended to correct gross inequities that unexpectedly developed.

This need is imperative because farmers are now making arrangements for this year's planting. Many are in a highly disturbed situation, and I think justifiably so.

I am supporting this resolution and urge my colleagues from all sections of this great country of ours to join us in correcting the inequities that exist which no one intended or expected when this Congress passed the act last year. I cannot emphasize too strongly to you the urgent need in order to carry out the intent of this Congress to be fair and honest to the producers of cotton of this country when we provided for acreage controls which was urged upon us and recognized by everyone as an absolute necessity.

I have been much interested in the many justified inquiries from Members from the nonproducing cotton areas of the country as to how it appeared that we are faced with the present situation and so many farmers find themselves in such a precarious position and unfairly penalized. Before the war controls were invoked under authority of Congress and by the vote and approval of the cotton producers. Such controls were approved by the farmers annually until 1942. At that time we were engaged in a world conflict and as it was not necessary controls were lifted in 1943. During the war we did not have surplus production. Our production was needed and utilized and made its contribution to the winning of the war.

Since the war we continued to have a large volume of exports and only during last year, 1949, did we start to realize surplus production again.

We have had many highly important adjustments to make which were inevitable following the war. For 4 years now these adjustments have been undertaken as necessary. Everyone understands that it takes time to adjust any highly involved economy in our productive programs.

In our agricultural program, cotton is one of the most important factors. It is basic to our agricultural economy. Just as controls were determined necessary before the war to prevent enormous surpluses of cotton wrecking the cotton economy, it became obvious a year ago that the country was going to be faced with the same serious surplus problem.

This was recognized by the cotton producers themselves. It was recognized by all who manifested an interest in the welfare of the farmer. We have a surplus from 1948 but not serious. In 1949, we find that the farmers planted nearly 27,000,000 acres in cotton. Seven million acres more than was planted on the average in the years from 1944 to 1948 when no controls were in effect. Consequently, we find ourselves now with a surplus of about 8,000,000 bales of cotton.

Because of this situation, the Congress at the request of the cotton producers and others appropriately considered the reestablishment of cotton acreage allotment and marketing quotas. It was thought that such legislation was needed as an essential part of a well-rounded agricultural program to provide a proper balance between supply and demand of agricultural commodities.

This viewpoint was adopted and urged throughout the country because it is necessary to maintain a more adequate price support so that the farmers may have a more adequate price for cotton products.

In discussing this fundamental problem with the farmers of my district, I find that they definitely understand that we could not continue the planting of more than 26,000,000 acres of cotton annually in the United States and producing more than 15,000,000 bales—continuing to build up great surpluses—without destroying the cotton market and the economy of the cotton farmers.

Therefore, the Congress last year provided for the reestablishment of controls by acreage allotments and marketing quotas.

It was generally believed and I personally had the impression that we were providing for a reduction in acreage generally of about 23 percent, from approximately 26,000,000 to 21,000,000 acres. If the act had worked out in actual practice as was intended and the reduction been general throughout the cotton-producing area many hundreds of farmers would not have now found themselves in such a desperate situation. I thought the reduction under this approach would generally provide for the 20 or 25 percent. The farmers thought it would work that way and so accepted it. Most everyone believed that it was the most equitable and fair approach. However, I will say to you, my colleagues, in all candidness, it just did not work out that way.

I can say, Mr. Chairman, with the same degree of assuredness, that an effort was made to see that equity did prevail. The Congress did not approach it lightly, but after the Agricultural Committee had made a very serious attempt to provide an act that would bring about a general reduction.

This I want to emphasize as the intention of Congress which is stated in the report on page 2. It says:

> It was never the intention of Congress that inequities, no matter how few, should result from application of the cotton-quota law and the purposes of this resolution—

That is, the one before us now—House Joint Resolution 398—> is to authorize insofar as possible, action to remedy those inequities.

Under the 1938 Agricultural Adjustment Act, the historical approach to acreage allotment was authorized. From experience, it was thought that there was need for substantial revision.

In reestablishing controls under the act in the last session of Congress, a definite approach was made which is known as the cropland apprpoach. That is a percentage of the total tillable cropland of the county.

This policy was approved only after the committee had made a careful and thorough study and was led to believe that it would be more acceptable. It was what generally became known here as the Memphis agreement, which was worked out at a belt-wide cotton conference held in Memphis in April 1949.

I make this explanation to show you, my colleagues, the reason this situation has developed as it has now showing the necessity for this resolution which I ask your support of.

This so-called Memphis agreement was preceded by several regional meetings as I understand and as recorded in the hearings by cotton producers. At the conference in Memphis, the House Committee on Agriculture participated in the hearings. Producers throughout the area participated. Committees, farm organizations, individuals all were present and helped to work out this plan so we were advised and the hearings so reveal.

Following this meeting in Memphis, the committee in Congress held hearings. The steering committee of the belt-wide cotton committee appeared and supported the program which was adopted. The steering committee represented farm organizations and producers so they claimed throughout the Cotton Belt area. Many farm organizations appeared before the committee urging this approach.

Mr. H. L. Wingate, who is chairman of the steering committee for the belt-wide cotton conference testified on behalf of the committee. The entire committee was presented with him and introduced. Mr. Wingate is also president of the Georgia Farm Bureau Federation. Mr. Harvey Adams, of the Agricultural Council of Arkansas, was a member of the committee.

Mr. Walter Randolph, president of the Alabama Farm Federation, testified on behalf of the American Farm Bureau Federation. Mr. R. E. Short, from our State of Arkansas, vice president of the American Farm Bureau Federation, appeared in behalf of the program. Other farm organizations testified before the committee to the effect that the cropland approach would be the most equitable method. They claimed they represented all cotton producers throughout the cotton-producing areas.

Therefore, this program was presented to Congress with wide support and I say there was no intention to do gross inequity to any cotton-producing farmers.

The allocation program on a National and State scale was naturally on a historical basis. Allocations to counties were made on a historical basis but the inequities resulted when the cropland method was applied within the county to the individual farmer.

Therefore, in reestablishing cotton controls the Agricultural Committees and the Congress considered these two methods: The historical formula, based on history of planting by the farmer, and the cropland formula. By this formula a factor is applied within each county by the percentage of cotton production within the county for the years of 1946, 1947, and 1948, to the total tillable cropland within the county as determined by reports of the Bureau of Agricultural Economics.

For example, a county with say 100,000 tillable cropland acres has according to BAE reports a history of cotton production for the years 1946, 1947, and 1948 of 12,000 acres. This would mean 12 percent on an average of the total cropland of the county was planted to cotton during these years giving that county a factor of 12 to 100.

In other words, a producer in one county with 100 acres of cropland having the percentage factor of 12 would have an allocation of 12 acres. A producer in an adjoining county with 100 acres of cropland with a percentage factor of 24 would have 24 acres. In another county a producer with 100 acres with a percentage factor of 48 would get 48 acres. These three examples—if the farmers had been producing, say, 60 acres each year out of their cropland, the first would have a reduction of 80 percent, the second a reduction of 60 percent, and the third a reduction of 20 percent.

The Agricultural Act of 1938 provided a form of cropland approach which was found after brief experience to be wholly inadequate to give the most equitable program. After a short trial amendments were provided and the historical formula was developed.

It is also true at that time we had fairly accurate figures on acreage of the individual farms which made it a more satisfactory formula. We have no accurate figures because we have not had controls for several years. Naturally this further aggravates the difficulty.

In my opinion, however, the cropland approach is not the best and most satisfactory way. In fact, I think it is morally wrong if applied to counties. The Department of Agriculture has contended that from years of experience it cannot work satisfactorily and from my study of this problem, I am in accord with that view. No doubt it would have worked some better had there not been such a divergency of views and unfortunately I fear some feeling among certain groups.

For example, there is no reason why a farmer with 100 acres or any number of acres in county X with a 47-percent county factor should be permitted under similar circumstances, identical situations, to have several times as much cotton as the grower with 100 acres, the same history and everything, in county Y with a 10-percent factor. In other words, Mr. Chairman, the producers in the counties with the highest percentage factors are given the advantage, an unfair advantage, over the producers in counties with low factors.

If the cropland formula is to be used it ought to apply State-wide as it is considered the allocation to the States are as equitable as possible, which is based on the historical formula.

Because this advantage is obvious to the high-factor counties, is it no surprise that generally the producers in those counties are expressing their satisfaction with this plan.

It appears to me that the historical formula would have been much better and certainly more equitable as it would not only be effective with the National allocation, the State allocation, and the county allocation but apply to the individual farms as well. Each farmer then would have his percentage reduction, which was believed by me, and I think the Congress, to have been our intention when this act was adopted last year.

To further aggravate this problem, a difference in BAE acreage and acreage reported by the farmers developed. As I have said heretofore, the figures of the Bureau of Agricultural Economics—BAE—apply to the State and county. There are no BAE figures on the individual farm. Because of this difference, I am thoroughly convinced that the inequities became much greater in many instances.

It is true, Mr. Chairman, that the Congress provided in the act for a reserve of 10 percent to the State and 15 percent to the counties. Authority was given to the State and county committees to adjust these inequities with the reserve. I am sure because of the general inequitable developments, the county committees in a great many instances determined no better way than to make this reserve acreage uniform to the cotton producers. In any event, it is so obvious that it has not worked out right.

The Allotment and Quota Act was passed in the latter part of the session last year. When we returned to our districts in October, the farmers began to get information as to its application to the individual farm. It was brought to my attention and I could hardly believe that there could be so many instances in the applicability to the farm where such gross inequities would occur. After meeting and discussing with many of my farmers and investigating this matter on the local level, I immediately became convinced it was only fair, honest, and just that it be corrected. I went to the State office in Little Rock. After conferring with them and finding the dilemma that existed there, I came on back to Washington. The first of December I met with the distinguished gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. COOLEY], chairman of the committee, and the officers and staff members of the Department of Agriculture. Many others throughout the cotton-producing areas also saw how the situation was and a serious effort was made to correct it.

This was just a few days before the referendum when the farmers were to vote on whether or not, by a two-thirds majority, controls would be invoked. Under the act, we left this determination to the farmers. There was grave apprehension that if this matter was not resolved more equitably, that the farmers would vote against the controls and I think rightly so.

It was, therefore, proposed that the very able chairman, Mr. COOLEY, would introduce a resolution and we would make an effort to see that no farmers would be reduced by more than 30 percent of his actual planting for the years 1946–48.

The chairman called his committee to meet here in Washington a few days later. The committee met, being convinced that something must be done, approved and announced that a resolution would be sponsored and immediately when the session opened, to provide that no farm, notwithstanding other provisions of law, should be reduced more than the higher of 30 percent of their actual planting of these base years or 50 percent of any one of the years 1946, 1947, 1948.

Announcement was made of the action of this great Agricultural Committee of the House. It was carried on the front page of the papers throughout the country just before the referendum.

The cotton farmers went to vote with that promise and assurance of such effort to make these adjustments.

In the referendum the farmers voted overwhelmingly for controls, realizing the necessity of doing something to prevent the destruction of the economy of the South. I am thoroughly convinced, Mr. Chairman, that they voted overwhelmingly for this program because this committee gave the assurance through the press the day before. We, therefore, are committed not only as a responsibility now but an obligation that we owe. I know if we maintain fair play with the farmers they will likewise cooperate in a program that is deemed best for all the country and not merely one section.

I want to highly commend, Mr. Chairman, this committee in its effort to carry out the responsibility and commitment. There is some difference of opinion as to this or that amendment. This will all be resolved under the 5-minute rule, but the committee has done, I am sure, the best it can and deserves the support of this House. I cannot too strongly urge your favorable consideration.

Mr. COOLEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield such time as he may desire to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. COLMER].

Mr. COLMER. Mr. Chairman, naturally, I favor the adoption of this resolution. Ever since the allotments of cotton acreage were made last fall the farmers of my district have been muchly concerned about the inequalities and inequities of these allocations. Therefore, upon my return to Washington the first of this year I discussed this problem with the chairman of the House Agricultural Committee, the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. COOLEY], and a number of the members of that committee in an effort to correct the original bill by appropriate resolution insofar as possible. Many other Members from the Cotton Belt have also been disturbed, and, as a result, the Committee on Agriculture in the House has brought forth this resolution.

When this resolution, House Joint Resolution 398, was first reported out of the committee, I contacted the State authorities in Mississippi, requesting them to advise me what, if any, relief this proposed legislation would give the cotton farmers of my congressional district. I was furnished this information by Mr. T. M. Patterson, executive officer, Production and Marketing Administration, United States Department of Agriculture, Jackson, Miss. According to Mr. Patterson, the 16 counties would receive increased acreage allotments, as follows:

County	Additional acreage required to furnish each county with—			Estimated number of frozen acres released
	70 percent of 1946, 1947, 1948 average actual cotton acreage	50 percent of 1946, 1947, 1948 highest planted cotton acreage	Higher of 70 percent or 50 percent provision
Covington	499.5	169.5	510.0	500.0
Jefferson Davis	127.0	39.5	162.5	2,000.0
Lamar	285.0	216.0	324.0	100.0
Lawrence	121.0	196.5	230.0	350.0
Marion	449.5	186.5	531.0	800.0
Forrest	47.0	35.5	59.0	225.0
George	15.0	0	15.0	100.0
Greene	3.0	16.5	19.5	150.0
Hancock	0	0	0	43.4
Harrison	0	0	0	78.1
Jackson	0	0	0	5.0
Jones	773.5	415.0	880.5	500.0
Pearl River	0	0	0	50.0
Perry	10.5	2.5	13.0	150.0
Stone	58.5	0	58.5	140.0
Wayne	160.0	3.0	163.0	500.0

While I am disappointed that this resolution does not grant greater and further relief, I must recognize that it does help out in this rather difficult situation. Therefore, I shall support the legislation.

Again, Mr. Chairman, I am disappointed with the 40-percent provision of the bill.

When members of the House Agricultural Committee were before the House Rules Committee seeking a rule on this legislation I asked the direct question if, under the resolution, any farmer could be cut more than 30 percent, and I was told that, under the resolution, no farmer could be cut less than 70 percent of his 1946, 1947, and 1948 average; but the debate has disclosed that, under the 40-percent provision of the resolution, it shall not operate to increase the cotton-acreage allotment of any farm above 40 percent of the acreage on such farm which is tilled annually or in regular rotation. I am, therefore, constrained to support the White amendment which would cut this 40-percent provision out of the bill. Mr. Chairman, we all realize that the production of cotton must, of necessity, be curtailed if we are to continue to receive governmental price support, but I am sure that we, also, further realize that this must be a gradual process and that the economy of the South will not stand too drastic a reduction. Certainly, it cannot stand any further reduction than that proposed under the provisions of the bill as amended by this resolution.

Mr. COOLEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield such time as he may desire to the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. LARCADE].

Mr. LARCADE. Mr. Chairman, you have heard from many of the representatives from the cotton-producing States as to their objections to the law establishing 1950 cotton acreage allotments, and on December 19, 1949, I attended a meeting of PMA officials and other interested parties in my home town from the three largest cotton-producing parishes in my district—St. Landry, Evangeline, and Acadia—and it was the opinion of those present that it was essential that certain changes be made in the law to cure the inequities and in order not to demoralize the industry. The group felt that farmers having more allotment than they want should be permitted to release part or all of their allotments to the PMA county committee for reapportionment to other farms which the county committee determines received inequitable allotments.

The group also thought that the acreage released should be considered released for 1 year only and that for the purpose of establishing acreage allotments in 1951 and subsequent years the acreage released in 1950 by a farm should be considered the same as acreage planted to cotton in 1950 on that farm.

This change in the law would not increase the national acreage allotment but would, in the opinion of those attending the meeting, provide a more equitable distribution of the national allotment.

Mr. Chairman, I feel that from all of the suggestions and debate here on the floor that the new bill which will be finally agreed upon will go just as far as it is possible to cure the inequities in the program, and while the new bill will not be perfect, it will include provisions to take care of the greatest number of complaints which have been voiced by those who have preceded me.

Mr. COOLEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield such time as he may desire to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. ANDREWS].

Mr. ANDREWS. Mr. Chairman, the purpose of House Joint Resolution 398 is to remedy certain inequities which have resulted from cotton- and peanut-quota laws. It has never been the intention of Congress to pass legislation which would impose undue and unnecessary hardships upon any group of American citizens. Yet, such unfortunate circumstances have arisen under the existing quota laws which were enacted by this body last year. Unless we act immediately, many farmers will be thrown into a state of despair and destitution.

I was in my district some 6 or 8 weeks ago, when the farmers began receiving their peanut and cotton quotas for 1950. During my tenure in Congress I have never seen any one circumstance, or even a group of circumstances, bring forth such an outburst of indignation. Never have I received as many letters and calls pleading for assistance. These pleas—these earnest appeals—are not without foundation. They are made by honest, sincere, hard-working Americans who ask only that their one means of livelihood not be taken from them. These appeals come from black and white alike.

Let me give you a brief picture of the outlook for my section in 1950. Agriculture predominates—there is very little industry. The major—generally speaking, the only—cash crops are peanuts and cotton. The 1950 quotas reduced peanut acreage for local farmers by 31.2 percent—almost one-third. This is in addition to a cut of 11 percent in 1949. Thus, in 2 years, the farmer has been compelled to reduce the production of his principal cash crop—peanuts—by almost one-half.

To further aggravate his position, the State cotton acreage was cut about 14 percent for the coming year. On the surface, this seems to be equitable and in line with the Government's attempt to maintain parity prices; but, looking further, quite the opposite is revealed.

Had the 14-percent reduction fallen upon all alike there would be no squawk. Such is not the case. The existing law does not treat all farmers alike. Some counties within the State receive a much greater cut than 14 percent. Others might have received less. The discrepancies within the counties are even greater. For example, some farmers who have abandoned the plow and turned to cattle are given cotton acreage which, of course, they have no need for. Others, who have always been big cotton planters, are receiving cuts of nearly two-thirds of last year's acreage.

Early in December, while visiting a small community within my district, a tenant farmer approached me with his quota problems. I do not remember just how many acres he has under cultivation, but I do remember that he has a wife and eight children to support. I have known him for some time—he has a good reputation and is known for his ability to work. His cotton acreage for this year has been cut from 18 acres to approximately 7.4 acres, almost 60 percent, and with his peanut acreage cut nearly in half, I challenge any man present to show how that farmer can support his family on the money he will net from farming this year under such conditions. This is only one instance. There are others too numerable to mention.

The picture is not so dark for the large landowner. Though he, too, has been cut severely, he can take care of himself by decreasing the number of tenants on his land—and that is exactly what he is doing. Most all of such landowners with whom I have talked say they are cutting off half their tenants in order that the other half will have enough acreage to provide a living.

Now, what are these cast-offs going to do? They are permitted to stay on the land, but how will they live? They have no cotton and peanut acreage, though they have been growing these crops all their lives. Yes; they could move, but where would they go? The same situation prevails in most of the other agricultural areas, so they could not migrate to other farms. An unbalanced economy precludes a movement to nearby cities. Any migration to highly industrialized areas would be impossible, first, because these people are unskilled laborers; secondly, there is no demand for such labor at this time. If assistance is not given through the passage of this resolution, then the Government will find itself feeding these farmers through the more expensive alternative of relief agencies before many months have elapsed.

These people cannot be held responsible for the plight in which they find themselves. The truth of the matter is that they were making progress toward diversified farming when war broke out in the early 1940's. At that time they were urged to return to high peanut and cotton yields. They responded with full knowledge that a reduction would be forced in the postwar years. After the war when we returned to controlled acreage and support prices, the farmers expected a gradual and uniform decrease in acreage. They expected, and were promised, an equitable system of quotas. This was our intention in passing the 1949 quota law. We were acting in the utmost good faith, yet unforeseen injustices have arisen. Last Friday my esteemed friend, the gentleman from Georgia, Congressman PACE, clearly outlined how such injustices have come about.

This resolution is a corrective measure. Its provisions will allow any farmer to bring his cotton acreage up to the minimum set out under the 1949 quota law. That minimum would be either 70 percent of his average over 3 years—1947, 1948, 1949; or 50 percent of any one of these years, so long as it does not exceed 40 percent of his cultivatable acreage. Granting that this adjustment will add a relatively small acreage to the national allotment, reliable estimates show that the acreage actually planted will not exceed the original national acreage allotment of 21,000,000 acres. Therefore, the national cotton acreage for 1950 would, in all probability, still be 23 percent below the 1949 acreage.

Section 5 of the resolution is designed to give relief to certain peanut-producing States. In establishing minimum State allotments, a few States were forced to take more severe cuts than others, and substantially in excess of the national reduction. This hardship is corrected by providing that the 1950 allotment for any State will not be reduced by a percentage greater than that by which the national acreage is reduced below the 1949 allotment. It is estimated that this will require adding only about 100,000 acres to the national allotment.

There is one other point that I would like to impress upon you. The effect of the existing law does not stop with the farmer. The banks in my area are in a state of consternation with regard to farmers' loans. A goodly portion of their business comes from this source. Colloquially speaking, they furnish many farmers on a yearly basis. They cannot furnish those who have little or no acreage for cash crops. Hence, they are shaking their heads when approached by these customers. With no money, no acreage, and no future under present laws, these farmers are turning to Congress—their last hope—with a prayer for justice.

I reemphasize, this is an emergency measure. The welfare of human beings is at stake. It is imperative that we take immediate action. Let us not break the faith of our farming friends.

Mr. COOLEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the distinguished gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. ALBERT] such time as he may desire.

Mr. ALBERT. Mr. Chairman, the purpose of House Joint Resolution 398 is to relieve hardships which have become manifest in the application of Public Law 272 of this Congress, throughout the cotton belt. The cotton provisions of this bill seek to do this in two different ways. Section 1 of the bill would allow farm cotton acreage allotments for the 1950 crop to be not less than the larger of 70 percent of the average acreage planted to cotton or regarded as planted to cotton under the war-crop provisions of Public Law 12 on the farm in 1946, 1947, and 1948 or 50 percent of the highest acreage planted to cotton or so regarded as planted during any 1 of these 3 years. The relief thus granted is further limited by a proviso to the effect that the cotton-acreage allotment of no farm shall exceed 40 percent of the cultivated land of such farm.

In order that those farmers who have not heretofore filed a notice of appeal regarding the cotton history on their farms for 1946, 1947, and 1948 may reopen this question, section 3 of the bill allows 15 days after the passage of this act for this purpose. This provision of the bill is necessary for two reasons. In the first place county committees were required to make their reports of cotton land in their respective counties conform to BAE estimates. The attention of the committee has been called to numerous instances in which arbitrary reductions were made by county committees in order to meet this requirement of the Department of Agriculture. In the second place, when notices of allotments were sent out to farmers, few, if any of them, knew that relief of the kind afforded by this resolution would be forthcoming. The result was that a large number of farmers undoubtedly failed to go to the trouble of filing notices of appeal. Had they known that relief of the kind contemplated here might be forthcoming, undoubtedly, many appeals would have been made by farmers able to prove what their cotton history actually was during the years contemplated by this measure.

Section 2 of the bill provides for the release and reallocation of acreage in accordance with regulations prescribed by the Secretary. Such released acreage must be used first to provide the allotments authorized by section 1 of the act. Any remaining acreage may be used in amounts determined by the secretary to be fair and reasonable for other farms in the same counties receiving allotments which the Secretary determines to be inadequate. Such surrendered acreage shall be credited to the State and county in future years unless hereafter otherwise provided by law. The provision which was contained in the previous resolution introduced by the chairman of our committee and in a resolution which I had heretofore introduced, allowing credit to the farm from which such acreage was released, has been depleted from the present resolution.

So far as I have been able to ascertain, just about everybody connected with the cotton business in my State, including State and County Production and Marketing Administration committees, farm organizations, associations of ginners and processors, and growers, had hoped from the beginning that any bill which might finally pass the Congress would vest simply authority in county committees to reapportion allotments voluntarily surrendered by growers who did not desire to plant all or any part of them. I have been advised by every section of the cotton industry of Oklahoma that were this authority given, Oklahoma could live within its present allotment and would not require its share of the additional bonuses contemplated by this measure.

There is a reason for this. In Oklahoma, State and county committees have reserved the full 15 percent allowed under the present law to take care of hardship cases. It is generally understood that it was the failure of State and county committees to make these reservations that has prompted the request for legislation of this kind. It has also been suggested that had this been done in all parts of the belt, no further relief would be necessary. I doubt that statements to this effect are true. I say this because Oklahoma committees did administer this law in accordance with the intention of Congress. Still, we have had brought to our attention innumerable cases of hardships, particularly in counties where the county factors were unusually small. In all of these instances consistent cotton growers have been severely crippled in their operations. Yet, I am advised on the best of authority that all such inequities could be eliminated if county committees were simply authorized to reallocate released allotments.

Section 2 of this bill does not go far enough in this direction. As construed in the committee report it virtually restricts the authority of county committees to reallocate any acreage beyond that needed to meet the requirements of section 1 to any farm not classified as a new farm.

I sincerely hope that before this measure is finally enacted, section 2 will be liberalized to give county committees broad authority to reallocate acreage so as to satisfy the needs not only of new farms but of consistent cotton growers. I hope also that as an incentive to growers who do not desire to plant their allotments this year, the law, as finally enacted, will authorize such growers to be given credit for the acreage thus released for future allotment purposes.

Mr. HOPE. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. CORBETT].

Mr. CORBETT. Mr. Chairman, I take this time to inform the Members of the House of a very interesting happening in the disposal of surplus commodities. It seems that two of our colleagues from Pennsylvania have been doing a very fine job in their areas in securing surplus potatoes for the families of the miners who are on strike and who are destitute. When they went to the food depot to see the potatoes they found two carloads of apples. So they hurriedly put in a request for the apples to be distributed to these same families; and they were informed that the apples were under consignment to the free-lunch program at Winchester, Va., the apple capital of the world.

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CORBETT. I yield.

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. Do I understand that the Department of Agriculture is sending surplus potatoes and other food to the miners who are on strike over in Pennsylvania?

Mr. CORBETT. That is correct. They are releasing right now potatoes to the families of those miners.

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. By what authority of law are they doing that?

Mr. CORBETT. I cannot answer, but they have received permission from the proper persons here and the aid has gone through the local agencies, in most cases the Salvation Army, which has been handling the distribution.

Mr. COOLEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CORBETT. I yield.

Mr. COOLEY. Is that not the explanation, and the answer to the question propounded by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN], that they are not making the food available to the families but to agencies?

Mr. CORBETT. Well, it all ends up with the food being distributed to the families.

Mr. COOLEY. That is specifically provided for in the law we passed last fall.

Mr. CORBETT. Regardless of the merits of that law, I do not want the point to be skipped that in Pennsylvania we are now shipping surplus apples to the apple capital of the United States, Winchester, Va.

Mr. MURRAY of Wisconsin. I just wanted to agree with what the chairman said. That is permissible under the law.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. CORBETT] has expired.

Mr. HOPE. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself the remainder of the time on this side.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is recognized for 6 minutes.

Mr. HOPE. Mr. Chairman, it is a little difficult for me to understand why there should be opposition to this legislation. I realize there are some Members from the cotton area who feel that the House should go further than this bill goes in attempting to remedy some of the inequities which have arisen under this act and the way it has been administered. But I think we all recognize that this is purely an emergency measure; that it is late; that we can only pass legislation which can be administered under a program which can be worked out in a hurry, and that we cannot at this time, in this hurried fashion, attempt to correct all of the difficulties which may have arisen under the administration of this act. This measure is a sincere attempt, and I hope a fairly effective attempt, to do away with as many of the injustices that have arisen under this act, as it is possible to do in emergency legislation.

Mr. HOLIFIELD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOPE. I yield briefly.

Mr. HOLIFIELD. Some of us would like to know why the views of the Department of Agriculture have not been given to the House on this matter. I understand there is a four-page letter from the Secretary which does not appear in the hearings and there is no attempt, to my knowledge, to bring it before the membership.

Mr. COOLEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOPE. I am glad to yield to the chairman of the committee to reply.

Mr. COOLEY. I intend to bring that letter to the attention of the House at the earliest opportunity. Let me point out the fact that the Department does approve of this legislation. I did not receive this letter until at the moment we were appearing before the Committee on Rules. The letter will be inserted in the RECORD.

Mr. HOLIFIELD. In today's RECORD?

Mr. COOLEY. In today's RECORD.

Mr. HOPE. I may say that it is my understanding that the Department of Agriculture approved of this legislation. This approval was expressed by a representative of the Department at the time the bill was under consideration. But at that time we did not have a specific letter under the signature of the Secretary. The Department was consulted, however, and its views were presented to the committee at the time the matter was under consideration.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOPE. A little later, if the gentleman will permit me to proceed.

Statements have been made to the effect that passage of this legislation would cost some money. Such statements are predicated entirely on the idea that it may result in an increased cotton acreage, and that it may result in some increased yield which, in turn, may result in the Federal Government's having to make more loans upon cotton than would be the case otherwise. It may happen or it may not happen. And if it does happen will not necessarily suffer a loss. No one knows what the cotton crop is going to be this year, but I call attention to the fact that this bill in connection with the bill which we passed last fall reduces the cotton acreage of this country by several millions of acres; it reduces the cotton acreage of this country below what it was 20 years ago by more than 50 percent. You cannot do those things all at once. We are dealing here not with bales of cotton, not with acres of land; we are dealing with human beings, with people who have to make a living on the land. You cannot regiment them or control them beyond a certain limit. I do not want to try to do it. I know injustices have occurred under this legislation, and I want to see every effort made that we can make at the present time to correct those injustices. I fail to see how others representing different areas of the country, for instance, the dairy section, can very well complain about this legislation, because dairy farmers are not operating under any restriction, they are operating under a program which provides for a mandatory support on dairy products, but there are no restrictions upon the acreage of crops they can plant for their dairy cattle; there is no restriction upon the number of dairy cows they can milk, or the amount of milk or other dairy products they may sell; yet they have practically the same mandatory price support provisions that are contained in the bill for commodities which are under restrictions. It is very likely that we are going to have in this session legislation dealing with other crops which are under restrictions, in an effort to make it possible for farmers to go along with those programs without being injured. We have not had restrictions since 1942 upon any crops except tobacco and peanut. During that time tremendous changes have taken place in acreage and production of all of our field crops. Farmers were asked to change the character of the crops which they produced; and, in order to win the war, they did so and they did so gladly. Now we are getting back to normal times. We cannot do it all at once; we are trying to do it gradually and with as little harm as possible to the individual farmer living out on the land and who must make his living on the land.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Kansas has expired.

Mr. COOLEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself such time as I may require.

Mr. Chairman, I desire to call to the attention of the Members of the House a letter dated January 26 from the Secretary of Agriculture as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE,
Washington, D. C., January 26, 1950.

HON. HAROLD D. COOLEY,
Chairman, House Agriculture Committee,
House of Representatives.

DEAR MR. COOLEY: This is in response to your request for the Department's recommendations concerning House Joint Resolution 398, relating to cotton and peanut acreage allotments and marketing quotas under the Agricultural Adjustment Act of 1938, as amended. The purpose of these amendments is to correct inadequate and inequitable allotments for a number of farms that have resulted in carrying out the provisions of Public Laws 272 and 439, Eighty-first Congress.

On the basis that the reported resolution is an emergency measure for 1 year designed to authorize the correction of certain gross inequities which have resulted from the application of the provisions of Public Laws 272 and 439, Eighty-first Congress, the Department is in favor of its enactment. However, the Department's recommendation is based on an understanding that you intend to reconsider Public Law 272 with the object in mind of rewriting the cotton acreage allotment provision of that law in a manner which will not require similar emergency measures in the future. The history of emergency amendments for correcting inequitable cotton acreage allotments is that the additional acreage allotted is always over and above the amounts considered necessary for proper adjustments of supplies to demand.

The basic principle involved in House Joint Resolution 398, particularly with reference to providing minimum 1950 farm cotton acreage allotments of not less than the larger of 70 percent of the average acreage planted or regarded as planted to cotton on the farm during the years 1946, 1947, and 1948, or 50 percent of the highest acreage planted or regarded as planted to cotton on the farm during such 3-year period, is a straightforward and practicable means of alleviating hardship cases now in existence because of the 1950 cotton acreage allotment established for such farms.

The committee's attention is called to some of the less desirable provisions of the resolution. Section 2, providing for farmers who have allotments in excess of what they desire to plant in 1950 to voluntarily surrender such allotments to the county committee for reapportionment to other farms in the county, will not actually reduce the amount of cotton that would otherwise be planted in 1950. The provisions of section 1 will give all farmers who request it the larger of 70 percent of the 3-year average acreage planted or regarded as planted to cotton or 50 percent of the highest acreage planted or regarded as planted to cotton in any 1 of such 3 years even though no acreage is surrendered by other farmers in the county.

The counties that will benefit most from surrender and reapportionment of unused cotton acreage allotments are those counties which have the most generous allotments in relation to the acreage of cotton which is being currently planted in such counties. For example, one county planted only 750 acres of cotton in 1948 and under the provisions of the law has an initial 1950 acreage allotment of 4,295 acres. Obviously, it will be quite easy for the farmers in such areas to release allotments and thereby retain credit for such county for subsequent years. On the other hand, a county having planted 21,100 acres of cotton in 1948 and having an initial 1950 acreage allotment of only 15,601 acres, which is a very substantial reduction from 1948, will have little, if any, cotton acreage allotments to release.

Counties and States in which little or no acreage would be released or reapportioned under section 2, will be at a disadvantage to those in which considerable acreage is released and reapportioned since the acreage so released and reapportioned would be used in establishing future State and county cotton acreage allotments. This could lead to major problems in the future in establishing State and county allotments.

If section 1 is enacted into a law as written in the resolution, the Department plans to use the acreage planted or regarded as planted to cotton on the farm as determined by the State and county committees which was used in computing farm acreage allotments under the current provisions of the Agricultural Adjustment Act of 1938, as amended, including the provisions of Public Laws 272 and 439, Eighty-first Congress.

Based on available information, an additional acreage of at least 1,400,000 acres would be allotted under the provisions of section 1. The provision relating to reopening allotments to appeal to review committees will add a substantial number of additional allotted acres to the minimum 1,400,000 acres previously estimated. The estimated additional cost represented by additional CCC loans ranges from $90,000,000 to $120,000,000. The estimated additional cost in connection with the administration and application of the provisions contained in the resolution is $2,000,000.

The difficulties encountered by the use of the cropland as a primary basis in establishing farm cotton-acreage allotments were clearly written in the history of the legislation and the administration of the Agricultural Adjustment Act of 1938. When the act was first enacted in February of 1938, no provision was included for establishing minimum cotton-acreage allotments for farms except for some of the smaller ones. Regulations and instructions were prepared for the administration of the original provisions of the act and were applied in some counties. Immediately it was noted that the same type of inequities about which many complaints are now being heard with respect to Public Law 272 likewise resulted when the original provisions of the act of 1938 were applied in these counties. A minimum farm allotment provision based on history to remedy such inequities, which provided that no farm would receive an allotment of less than 50 percent of its 1937 planted plus diverted cotton acreage up to 40 percent of the land tilled annually or in regular rotation on the farm, was enacted in April of 1938. This amendment, as well as the provision now proposed in this resolution, relies on cotton-acreage history in order to have satisfactory allotments established. In 1938, when the cropland-factor approach did not work satisfactorily, we had the actual measured acreage of cotton and cropland for each farm for each year in the base history.

Thus, the cropland approach for establishing farm cotton-acreage allotments did not work in 1938, when accurate farm data were available. It did not work for 1950, when reported farm data formed the basis for determining basic data for individual farms. Accordingly the underlying cause of inequitable allotments was the use of cropland as a primary basis for apportioning county allotments to individual farms.

Section 5 provides for minimum State peanut acreage allotments. On November 30, 1949, a national peanut marketing quota of 643,000 tons for the 1950 crop was announced. This quota would result in a national acreage allotment of 1,933,835 acres for 1950. However, Public Law 272, Eighty-first Congress, provides that the 1950 national acreage allotment shall be not less than 2,100,000 acres. The provisions of section 5 would increase the national acreage allotment to 2,200,194 acres. On the basis of the 5-year normal yield, the 100,194 additional acres would produce 33,315 tons of peanuts. Since these would not be required for use in domestic edible channels, they would be delivered to CCC and would have to be crushed for oil and meal. The additional loss to CCC as a result of this additional acreage is estimated from $3,500,000 to $4,000,000. This provision is intended to lessen the reduction in acreage required of certain States by virtue of provisions of Public Law 272 and further illustrates the consequences of legislation requiring producers in one area to make a greater reduction than that expected of producers in other areas.

Although certain difficulties will arise as pointed out in this report in administering the provisions of the resolution, the Department offers no objections to its enactment since remedial legislation is urgently needed to provide relief. However, this type of legislation should not be continued for future years but in lieu thereof the basic legislation should be revised to apportion the county cotton allotments to farms primarily on the basis of recent cotton acreage history, giving due weight to sound land use, agricultural conservation, crop-rotation practices, etc. To do otherwise will necessitate reenacting next year this type of a provision to again provide relief.

Sincerely yours,

K. T. HUTCHINSON,
Acting Secretary.

Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may have permission to revise and extend their remarks at this point in the RECORD on this resolution.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from North Carolina?

There was no objection.

Mr. LANHAM. Mr. Chairman, I am in favor of House Joint Resolution 398, amending H. R. 272, of the Eightieth Congress, setting up a program of crop-acreage allotments. While I do not think the resolution will entirely solve the problem that has arisen in the administration of the acreage-allotment law, I think it will go a long way toward eliminating the inequities that have resulted from the administration of the law.

The statement has been made repeatedly by members of the Committee on Agriculture, that the crop-acreage-allotment law as passed by the Eightieth Congress took care of the small farmer. In this connection, I think we should distinguish between the small land owner and the small tenant or share cropper who does not own his land. It may well be that the law as originally passed does take care of the small land owner who was growing cotton during the years 1946, 1947, and 1948. I am sure, however, that it has not had this result as far as the small share cropper and tenant are concerned. As a matter of fact, it has had the result of driving many of these small farmers off the farm and into the cities to become a charge on the public-welfare agencies of the cities or to wander from place to place seeking employment. This is true because of the unforeseen results that have followed the attempt to put the law into effect. This is true because the larger land owners who operate their farms with tenants or share croppers have received such heavy cuts in acreage, sometimes as much as 80 to 85 percent, that they have been unable to keep the tenants on their land.

I am sure when we voted for the original act that none of us anticipated any such a result. To me it is a powerful demonstration of the fact that it is difficult for the planners to substitute their plannings for the laws of supply and demand. Do not misunderstand me, I know that a certain amount of long-range planning on the part of the Government is necessary if we are to keep our economy on an even keel and make it an ever-expanding one. In the first place, let me say that I believe in the price-support program and I fully realize that if the Federal Government is to support prices, we must have some means of controlling the crops upon which price supports are to be paid. And what I say is not in any sense in criticism of the Committee on Agriculture and especially of the subcommittee which devoted long hours to hearings and gave the best of its thinking in the drafting of the act. The act was drawn, as the committee has said, after a period of time during which we had no price-support program and no control over the crops planted. For that reason, the Department of Agriculture had no definite figures and data upon which the committee could base the acreage-control law.

But after all, it seems to me that the effect which this bill has had certainly in its application to cotton acreage, should be a warning to us that even with all of the information from statistics it is possible to obtain, nevertheless, it is very, very difficult to foresee all the results of any planning we may do. This should warn us to interfere as little as possible with known economic laws as we seek to legislate for the benefit of all segments of our complicated and complex agricultural and industrial economy.

While it may see at first blush that the adoption of this resolution will increase the total acreage of cotton planted for the coming crop year, this will not necessarily be the effect since so much of the previous allotment is "frozen," so to speak, due to the fact that it has been made to farmers who do not intend to plant cotton. Past experience has shown that efforts to recover any such frozen acreage are, as a rule, not very effective. Consequently, this resolution even with the elimination of the 40-percent provision will not result in the planting of any more acreage than was at first contemplated under the original act.

Unless this resolution is adopted, it is going to mean real suffering in my district and the dislocation of our entire farm economy. Therefore, I urge the early adoption of the resolution after the elimination of the 40-percent clause and even if the 40-percent clause is not stricken, the resolution should be adopted.

Mr. EVINS. Mr. Chairman, on Friday last when this measure first was brought before the House for consideration, I was pleased to speak briefly in the interest of this proposed amendment to the Cotton Acreage Allotment Act and to urge strongly that approval be given to this legislation without delay. I cannot too strongly emphasize the urgency of this situation and the tremendous burden of financial loss which threatens hundreds of farmers in my district, the Fifth District of Tennessee, unless adjustments are made in the present statute.

The committee failed to take conclusive and affirmative action on this proposal at the last meeting and I rise again to reassert the urgency of the cotton acreage situation and imperative need for immediate action.

Within the Fifth Tennessee District, there are several counties which may be classified as major cotton-producing counties—counties which are as clearly and definitely a part of the so-called Cotton Belt as any section of the South. The economy of these counties is largely dependent on and based upon the production of cotton. The counties of Franklin, Giles, and Lincoln Counties, of my district border upon the State of Alabama and are predominantly cotton-producing counties.

While the situation is similar in this concern for all three counties, for the sake of brevity at this time, I should like to cite figures affecting only Lincoln County to illustrate the tremendous inequities which have developed in the operation of the cotton-acreage quota program.

The Quota Act has established for Lincoln County, Tenn., a cotton factor of 12.4—that is, as we know, an allowance of 12.4 acres of cotton in 1950 based on the 1946, 1947, and 1948 average acreage planted in cotton. That will mean that an average acreage of an estimated 23,126 acres, will, this year, be cut to 13,894 acres—this is a cut of 39.9 percent.

The national cotton-acreage cut, as we know, amounts to approximately 21.9 percent. Thus, Lincoln County, with a cut of 39.9 percent has suffered a forced reduction in cotton acreage which is 17.9 percent greater than the national average. Further than that, the same county has suffered a reduction 25 percent greater than the average for the State of Tennessee—which has an average reduction under the present program of approximately 14 percent. No wonder the farmers of Lincoln County voted against continuation of the present cotton-acreage program—the only county in Tennessee that so voted in the recent cotton referendum.

Now, Mr. Chairman, to further illustrate the inequities under the present program I should like to cite a few other figures. As I indicated a moment ago, Giles, Franklin, and Lincoln Counties in the Fifth District of Tennessee, all border upon the State of Alabama.

I have cited the figures affecting Lincoln County, Tenn., which has a 1950 cotton factor of 12.4 percent, allowing for a total acreage of 13,894 acres.

Madison County, Ala., has been given a 1950 cotton factor of 30.66 allowing a total of 34,352 acres while Limestone County, Ala., has been given a 1950 factor of 28.66 allowing a total of 32,113 acres.

The above figures, Mr. Chairman, illustrate how unfair and unequal the system has proved under operation. Lincoln County, Tenn., Madison County, Ala., and Limestone County, Ala., are all adjoining counties, each having similar land, all being in the basin of the Elk River. Yet, because Madison and Limestone Counties are in Alabama and therefore considered to be in cotton-producing areas, they are given more than twice as much cotton acreage as Lincoln County, Tenn.—the same conditions prevail also for the other two counties of my district which border upon the State of Alabama—Franklin and Giles Counties. It seems to me unfair in the highest degree that the boundary of a State line should be allowed to work such inequities as has resulted in the case which I have been pleased to cite by way of illustration. The lands are the same, the crops are the same.

It is not my intention to take the time of the committee to great length—and I believe that the illustration which I have given offers definite proof of the inequities which exist under this system. We see how it is possible for the entire economy of a prosperous county to be put in the position of being completely upset and ruined through the operation of a particular statute. The loss for one county in my district alone will run to approximately $1,000,000 unless some changes are made in the present program.

Again may I say that the present resolution may not provide all the relief desired, but it is certainly a step in the right direction and should be adopted.

I earnestly urge that we act now to revise the law in this respect—these cotton farmers must be allowed to know what is in store for them well in advance of the planting season to make their plans for a crop. Delay would be disastrous. Let us act now, decisively and affirmatively, on the proposed amendment to bring some measure of relief to these hard-pressed cotton farmers.

Mr. COOLEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield the balance of the time on this side to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. ABERNETHY].

Mr. ABERNETHY. Mr. Chairman, first I want to express my appreciation for the very fine statement which the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. HOPE], just made in support of this resolution. As his statement indicates, he has never confined his service to the great wheat area which he represents. On the contrary, he has for years labored hard for the benefit of all of agriculture, not just a part of it. We are grateful for his fine service. Those of us who come from cotton areas also appreciate the interest which has been manifested in this matter by the Members who live outside the cotton sections of the South, Southwest, and far West.

It has been inferred that no hearings were conducted on the pending resolution. Such is not the case. I would like to have the Members bear in mind that this is a piece of legislation dealing with an extreme emergency. When the emergency came to the surface last fall the chairman of our committee called our subcommittee to Washington to consider the problem. At that time we conferred with and sought the counsel of officials in the Department of Agriculture. Immediately preceding this conference the Secretary of Agriculture, Mr. Brannan, in a speech made in Memphis before a meeting of Production and Marketing Administration officials, specifically stated that emergency legislation was needed for the purpose of correcting inequities.

My chairman has just referred to the Secretary's letter endorsing the resolution before us. Some questions have been asked about it. Therefore, I would like to quote from the letter:

On the basis that the reported resolution—

He is speaking with regard to the resolution now before the House.

On the basis that the reported resolution is an emergency measure for 1 year designed to authorize the correction of certain gross inequities which have resulted from the application of the provisions of Public Laws 272 and 439, Eighty-first Congress, the Department is in favor of its enactment.

Mr. Chairman, that should lay aside once and for all any question in the mind of anyone as to whether or not this resolution has the support of the Department of Agriculture.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ABERNETHY. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. KEATING. I did not understand whether the gentleman said there were or were not hearings on this measure?

Mr. ABERNETHY. I am getting to that. We conducted hearings but they were informal. We had a hearing in December. I have already referred to that. We gathered in Washington in January. On many, many occasions since January 3 the subcommitee was in conference with Members of Congress, representatives of the Department, representatives of the Farm Bureau, and many individuals. During one morning in the committee room I would say there were at least 65 Members of Congress present, many of whom expressed their views and all of whom had the privilege of expressing their views had they so desired.

Not less than four or five officials of the Department of Agriculture met with the subcommittee time after time and expressed their views. Now with the assistance, advice, and counsel of all of these people, farmers, the Farm Bureau, the Secretary of Agriculture, his assistants, and Members of Congress, it cannot be said that this resolution resulted without hearings. This matter has been well considered. It will help. It is not perfect. It represents a compromise of views. We know that inequities have resulted and many people will seriously suffer this year unless you pass this resolution. The committee commends it to your serious consideration and urges its adoption.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Mississippi has expired.

All time has expired. The Clerk will read the resolution for amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, etc., That, notwithstanding the provisions of the Agricultural Adjustment Act of 1938, as amended, including amendments made by Public Law 272, Eighty-first Congress, and Public Law 439, Eighty-first Congress, no farm cotton acreage allotment established for the 1950 crop in conformity with the law and the regulations of the Secretary of Agriculture shall be less than the larger of 70 percent of the average acreage planted to cotton or regarded as planted to cotton under Public Law 12, Seventy-ninth Congress, on the farm in 1946, 1947, and 1948, or 50 percent of the highest acreage planted to cotton or regarded as planted to cotton under Public Law 12, Seventy-ninth Congress, on the farm in any one of such three years. if the owner or operator of the farm applies in writing for the allotment authorized by this section and certifies that the acreage allotment will be planted to cotton: Provided, That this section shall not operate to increase the cotton acreage allotment of any farm above 40 percent of the acreage on such farm which is tilled annually or in regular rotation, as determined under regulations prescribed by the Secretary. The additional acreage required to be allotted to farms under this section shall be in addition to the county, State, and National acreage allotments proclaimed by the Secretary of Agriculture for the 1950 crop of cotton, and the production from such acreage shall be in addition to the national marketing quota for such crops. The additional acreage authorized by this section shall not be taken into account in establishing future State, county, and farm acreage allotments.

Mr. GRANGER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word, and I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Utah?

There was no objection.

Mr. GRANGER. Mr. Chairman, it is said that this is a piece of emergency legislation. I do not know whether it is or not. Certainly, up until this point, no one has been hurt by the present law.

About a year ago most of the metal mines of the country were closed. It was said that it was due to the decrease in the price of metals. As the result of the closing of the mines, the miners were laid off, and you people who know anything about mining know that these people own their own homes, they are men of middle age, and it is impossible for them to change their employment.

As a result of that disastrous event there was legislation introduced in the Congress by a member of the Committee on Public Lands, the gentleman from California [Mr. ENGLE]. There was also legislation introduced in the other body. That was introduced for the purpose of meeting an emergency that was real. That legislation was sent to the Committee on Rules. It is still there slumbering and gathering dust.

You talk about an emergency. What do we have here? We have a piece of legislation that has hurt no one as yet, but it takes precedence over a piece of legislation that has been before the Committee on Rules since last October, and no action has been taken upon it. I would like to know what kind of justice this is. We have thousands of miners in this country who are walking the streets, out of work, and the reason we did not get this rule out of the committee was because they said it would cost $80,000,000. It will not cost one-tenth of what this legislation will cost which we are considering today.

Mr. POAGE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GRANGER. I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. POAGE. Does the gentleman contend that the fact that we have this bill on the floor today is in any wise interfering with the passage of the bill in which he is interested?

Mr. GRANGER. I am not saying that at all. I will say to the gentleman that is beclouding the issue. I am telling you what is a fact and what consideration we have had from the Committee on Rules. There are many members on the Committee on Rules that are tremendously interested in this piece of legislation, and we are interested in other legislation, and we think it is unfair to come here with a bill that will cost $1,000,000,000, likely, under the guise that the other bill would cost the taxpayers some money.

Mr. SUTTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GRANGER. I yield to the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. SUTTON. Does the distinguished colleague on the Committee on Agriculture realize that there are more of us interested in cotton legislation than the few on the Committee on Rules; that they are not the only ones in the United States of American that produce cotton and that they are not the only ones that represent cotton districts, and that actually the members on the Committee on Rules have a very minor part in the cotton production in the United States; in fact, half of the cotton produced in the United States is produced in Texas and California.

Mr. GRANGER. I do not yield further. That is beside the point. That is not what I am talking about. I am not accusing the Committee on Agriculture of doing anything it should not do, but I do say that this is a situation on which we expect to get some cooperation from the Rules Committee, we hope very early, because a tremendous emergency exists in the mines of the country. The men are out of work. They have used up all their unemployment compensation. The situation is desperate. We want something done about it.

Mr. PICKETT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GRANGER. I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. PICKETT. The gentleman states that under the present law in allocating cotton acreage no one is hurt.

Mr. GRANGER. "Yet," I said. No one is hurt yet.

Mr. PICKETT. May I say to the gentleman that he probably is not accurately informed, because I can tell him that a good many people are already hurt because of the low cotton factor and acreage allotment that is being made all over the country. The reason for it is that preparation has to be made in December and early January to take care of the tenants that work these cotton crops. The farm-implement dealers and other suppliers of the necessary equipment that goes into the making of a cotton crop are not able to sell their implements, and everything else that goes into the economic factor toward making a cotton crop is already hurt by this low allotment.

Mr. GRANGER. I agree with everything the gentleman said.

Mr. POULSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GRANGER. I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. POULSON. The gentleman is bringing out the point that if it is fair for one it certainly is fair for another industry to be treated that way?

Mr. GRANGER. That is what I have been trying to put across—the fairness of this thing. This is a situation with which we are confronted. You are going to have wheat up here the next time, and maybe corn.

Mr. RANKIN. Before the gentleman gets away from that situation, will he yield for a question?

Mr. GRANGER. I yield to the gentleman from Mississippi.

Mr. RANKIN. Would the enforcement of the Taft-Hartley law help any?

Mr. GRANGER. No; this is a case where the miners did not go on strike. It is a case where the mines closed because the owners claim they could not operate because of the prices paid for ore. It has nothing to do with the Taft-Hartley Act.

Now we are facing the music. Sometimes Congress has to face the facts we are called upon to face today. We are going to have it in wheat, we have it in cotton, and we may have it in corn. Of course, if we do that we are going to go down the line and include everybody.

In this instance, if it were not for a case such as we have in Texas I would be against this legislation, because I believe that in Texas there has been some maladministration that needs to be rectified. I am willing to go for the bill because of that feature in it, but some of these days we will have to face up to these things. We should not be forced into the position where every time someone complains we increase the acreage to satisfy complaints of a small minority, as we are doing in this legislation. In this time of economy, of course, this bill today will cost the taxpayers a lot of money.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GRANGER. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. KEATING. Can the gentleman tell us how much it is going to take out of the pockets of the wage earners of this country if this bill is passed?

Mr. GRANGER. I do not know that I could say, and I do not know that there are any actual figures that could be quoted on that score. There are a lot of "ifs" in any estimate. As I understand it, the cotton program this year, at the minimum, might cost close to three-quarters of a billion dollars.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GRANGER. I yield.

Mr. TABER. The average production of cotton is supposed to be something like 300 pounds to the acre; is that right?

Mr. GRANGER. Three hundred and fifty or three hundred and sixty pounds, I think.

Mr. TABER. Suppose we take 300 pounds as the figure. With a million and a half additional acres in production, that would be about 900,000 bales, and at 90 percent of parity that would be something like $144 a bale, which would be $130,000,000, according to my figures.

Mr. COLMER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GRANGER. I yield.

Mr. COLMER. Is it not also fair to say—and I know my friend always wants to be fair as well as my friend here—that it might not cost the Government anything?

Mr. GRANGER. Yes; there is always that possibility. As I said, there are a lot of "ifs" in it. I would not say what it is going to cost, but it could cost some money.

Mr. WHITE of California. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GRANGER. I yield.

Mr. WHITE of California. I know the gentleman from New York did not intend to create a false impression. According to his figures, if he had placed the decimal point correctly, it would be $130,000,000.

Mr. GRANGER. Mr. Chairman, I am going to go along with this legislation. I think it is necessary in this one particular which I have mentioned. I just know that sometimes we have to stand up and face the facts of this situation and not be stampeded every time we get a letter from somebody who is dissatisfied with his acreage allotment. I can assure everyone that the Secretary of Agriculture is in favor of and advocates the passage of this legislation.

Mr. MURRAY of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, I also ask unanimous consent to proceed for five additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Wisconsin?

There was no objection.

Mr. MURRAY of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, I want to clear up the atmosphere here a little bit today. First of all I wish my distinguished colleague from Kansas would read the law we passed last year. He will find that the dairy products do not have 90 percent of parity support, but instead have from 75 percent to 90 percent. So I hope to get the record straight in that respect. It is not a question of the dairy industry. It is nothing new so far as I am concerned. As I said Friday, when I presented a table which I had prepared in 1940. Let us get out of the Cotton Belt here altogether. Under that table the State of Kansas and the State of Wisconsin for years had been the sixth and seventh agricultural States in the Nation. Up until 1940 Kansas had around $175,000,000 or $180,000,000 either for growing or not growing, something I never could figure out which, and never could be sure, and the State of Wisconsin had some forty-and-some-odd-million dollars. There is not that much difference between the two States. The difference is in the kind of agriculture that they had. One congressional district in Texas, one in Kansas, and one in Iowa each had a subsidy equal to what the whole State of Wisconsin had received. This is a livestock against an anti-livestock attitude and that is all this is a part of right here today. The cotton people are faced with a serious problem. They face a declining demand for their product and very surely face a rural social problem. But the people who have lived and made a living on these 6,000,000 acres are most assuredly faced with a serious problem. But are you going to solve it by providing a 90 percent parity support for 70 percent of the production on a million or a seven and one-half million dollar cotton farm Or are we going to solve it by providing the little producer a quota of 2½ bales or 5 acres and the big operators a quota or an allotment of 1,000 to 3,000 bales? As serious as this problem is on this cotton section, the facts are that cotton farmers are not asked to face problems any more serious than all the rest of the farmers face.

Did you ever figure out how much of the public funds will be needed to support the cotton on the Clayton-Anderson seven and one-half million dollar California farms? That gives you an indication of one of the troubles of the whole agricultural program.

We have been talking for the little fellow but we have been putting him out of business. That is the objection I have had to the agriculture program since the day I arrived here, and even before. In fact, I maintain it has been nothing but a landowners' program. The little get smaller and the big get bigger. If we keep on this road we have been going for the past 10 or 15 years, it will not be too long before the land of this country will be owned by too few people.

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MURRAY of Wisconsin. I yield for a question.

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. That is just what the trouble is. They are talking about tenant farmers on these large plantations. Is there anything in this legislation to prevent the owner of these large plantations from securing machinery and putting all this land into cotton and doing away with the tenant farmer altogether?

Mr. MURRAY of Wisconsin. Of course not.

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. That is what they have done in a great many areas.

Mr. MURRAY of Wisconsin. Now, what is going to become of the people who live on 10,000,000 acres of land that the wheat is going to be cut back or the 11,000,000 acres of corn that will be cut back? But that is the kind of an agricutural economy we have had for the last 16 years—corn, cotton, and wheat. It does not make sense to continually pour out public funds, year after year, for these soil-depleting crops, and spend a million or more dollars for exports—they have a subsidy on exports year after year, and all we are doing now is going back to what we had in 1939. In August 1939 when we had 54-cent wheat and paid 27 cents per bushel as an export subsidy and 8-cent-plus cotton, and so on down the line. If it makes sense to subsidize the shipment of $500,000,000 worth of cotton and at the same time import $497,500,000 worth of livestock and livestock products, as we did in this last fiscal year, then there is no use for any agricultural colleges in the United States. You might as well cut out all appropriations. This is livestock versus the kind of economy that is going to ruin the country; asking the public to roll out money in order to carry on that kind of economy.

Mr. CHRISTOPHER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MURRAY of Wisconsin. Yes. I will yield to my friend from Missouri because I feel sorry for him. On Saturday night I heard over the radio from Wheeling, W. Va., that they wanted to sell their chickens for $2.95 per hundred. Missouri is a great chicken State. I feel sorry for my friend to try to explain that to his people.

Mr. CHRISTOPHER. I will be brief. I would just like to ask the gentleman, If our agricultural program is wrong and always has been wrong, what does the gentleman suggest to take the place of it?

Mr. MURRAY of Wisconsin. Well, that is a good question, and I sure have worked at it, and I will give it to you right now.

I sat around here for the first year or two. I was not very hard to get along with. There was a man came along by the name of Henry Steagall, of Alabama, a man who had made more contribution to American agriculture than any Congressman in the history of this country. It is just too bad he has not been with us, because Mr. Henry Steagall did not say, "Oh, we have got to talk about corn and cotton and wheat," which is less than 25 percent of American agriculture; but Henry Steagall produced legislation that took support right straight across the board. There is no one man who ever made more contribution to agriculture than Mr. Steagall made so far as legislation is concerned.

Mr. GRANGER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MURRAY of Wisconsin. I yield.

Mr. GRANGER. I want to sympathize with the gentleman from Wisconsin. He has not been hard to get along with, but he has been taking some kicking around in the Committee on Agriculture. The recent passage of this so-called oleo bill does not set very well with him and many of us. If you people want to have your hearts torn out, I wish you would go to the gentleman's office and see "Old Rosy," with crepe hanging over her horns and a sign on there which says, "Weep not for me but for those who would destroy me." That is something that is the matter with some parts of the agriculture program. People who are supporting this legislation now, wanting it in such a hurry, might think for a moment that they have stabbed in the back one of the greatest industries in this country—the little-business man who has a dairy outfit who is liable to be destroyed, or at least he thinks so.

Mr. MURRAY of Wisconsin. That is a livestock approach, it is not only for the dairy industry. The dairy is only a little over 20 percent of the national farm income. The remainder is beef, hogs, eggs, poultry, and sheep, all that go with them. Remember now, that eggs in the Midwest today are bringing but 39 percent of parity. I never heard of baby chicks selling for $2.95 a hundred before either.

Mr. COOLEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MURRAY of Wisconsin. In just a moment.

I have not criticized this bill because when I criticize I want to have something constructive to offer in its place. I would not oppose this or any other bill without a constructive substitute. My constructive proposals are: One, to recognize the fact that the rural people of this country are Americans and are entitled to the same laws that govern the rest of the people. That sounds simple, but why do we not do it? Why do we not extend wage-and-hour legislation to agricultural labor? Now, would not that be terrible if we should do that? We know one of our great labor organizations, the A. F. of L., has been trying to do that ever since I have been here in Congress. My colleague, the gentleman from Utah, knows the situation with reference to sugar beets. He made the fight for it. We could not get it properly considered by the committee; it had to wait until it came to the floor to be amended, and when the amendment was offered to include labor in the beet fields, he took one of the leading parts in that fight.

I would extend social security to rural people. Can anyone tell me why we should not when we are doing it for everybody else? We have a real problem in the matter of farm labor, a problem of employment caused by the large operators, not by the small farmer at all, but the large operator who pulls people in legally or illegally at the time of harvest and then dumps them on the community after the harvest is over.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin has expired.

Mr. MURRAY of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five additional minutes. We gave the opponents a lot of time even on my side.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Wisconsin?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin is recognized for five additional minutes.

Mr. MURRAY of Wisconsin. Can anyone tell me why we should not deal with this problem created by these big employers of farm labor who bring employees into this country legally or illegally to help them harvest the crops, but when the harvest is over expect the community to support the labor on the relief rolls? Does that make good sense? Should the support be provided the small farmers instead of the speculative interests? What we need is a farmers' program, not a land owners' program. If we had one we would have fewer embarrassing surpluses. These embarrassing surpluses are made by a comparatively few people.

Now, I have been here many years and most of you know my views. I am speaking today of problems of the rural people of this country and pleading for the genuine farmers, the small farmers, not the speculators. You protect the other groups and expect Uncle Sam and the taxpayer to foot the bill.

Mr. ABERNETHY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MURRAY of Wisconsin. I yield.

Mr. ABERNETHY. As I understood the gentleman last week when he made the first part of his statement, he said that he had been making this fight for some 8 or 10 years. I assume that the gentleman is rather at odds with the present program and that he is proposing a different program. Can the gentleman tell us the number of his bill so that we might make a study of it?

Mr. MURRAY of Wisconsin. I shall be very glad to answer that in all humility. I supported the Steagall bill and the Hope bills. They were sufficient if administered correctly. The Committee on Rules is not the only place where they bottle things up, and if I could only get my bills out of the Committee on Agriculture I would not worry about the Committee on Rules. I will answer the gentleman by saying that if he is on the committee he knows that the only Hope bill that came out in the Eightieth Congress was just exactly the same as this: Corn, cotton, and wheat. How about H. R. 6514 to support five bales of cotton and bushels of wheat? No consideration yet?

Mr. ABERNETHY. Did the gentleman support the bill he just referred to?

Mr. MURRAY of Wisconsin. It was the same as the Steagall bill; I do not see why I should not.

Mr. ABERNETHY. Did the gentleman support the agriculture bill last year?

Mr. MURRAY of Wisconsin. Support the Hope bill? Yes; after the livestock supports were included but not before.

Mr. ABERNETHY. The 1949 act.

Mr. MURRAY of Wisconsin. That was a matter of taking a little mouthful instead of not getting anything at all. It was not a case of my liking it. Of course, I could take 10 minutes to explain that.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MURRAY of Wisconsin. I yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. CRAWFORD. The gentleman refers to a 75-cent minimum for farm labor. Does he mean by that those who are doing productive work on the farm, not just the hired man?

Mr. MURRAY of Wisconsin. I did not mention the amount. I was referring to a comparable minimum wage. I did not make any particular statement on amount. They are entitled to a minimum wage comparable to what everyone else is accorded in the United States. That is my position.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Would the gentleman have that arrangement, whatever the arrangement is, made before so that the farmer knows he will get that wage before he prepares the seedbed, before he plants, before he cultivates, before he harvests and before he goes to market with his stuff? I raise that question because in the case of manufactured goods the collective-bargaining agreement does provide the wage before the worker goes through the time clock office on the way to the factory and the farmer is entitled to the same protection from the Congress of the United States if you are going to give that to organized labor in the factory. I think that is the point the gentleman is making.

Mr. MURRAY of Wisconsin. I thank the gentleman. If this bill is to go into effect, the family-sized farm should have a chance. There is the subsidy of $2,500 provided to the large operators. During the last session, the hearts were beating for the little ones, so they upped it to $2,500 again.

Mr. GRANGER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MURRAY of Wisconsin. I yield to the gentleman from Utah.

Mr. GRANGER. I do not suppose the gentleman was inferring that the sugar-beet industry was paying less than the 75-cent minimum wage?

Mr. MURRAY of Wisconsin. I did not say they were. I used that as an example. There is the letter from the Department of Agriculture, and I do not want anyone to say I am criticizing Mr. Brannan, but a Secretary of Agriculture fixed it from 25 to 32 cents an hour.

Mr. Chairman, I have never met the author of this article which appeared in one of our oldest agricultural publications, the Country Gentleman. I happened to note this article yesterday. The remarks I have made about the cotton resolution, that will exact another $5 bill from each American family this year for a crop we have no possible use for, surely coincides with the thoughts expressed in this article. Why are several countries ahead of us in the use of the most protective diets? The article is as follows:

[From the Country Gentleman of April 1949]

WE CAN'T TAKE CHANCES ON TOMORROW'S MEALS

(By H. E. Babcock)

Soon after the Eighty-first Congress settled down to work, I spent a week in Washington looking it over. There are too many men in Congress to get acquainted with each one, so at the end of my stay I resorted to a stockman's device. Mentally I ran them through a cutting chute and sorted them according to their qualifications to vote on farm and food legislation.

My first cut was less than a score of Senators and Representatives who seem to me to have a grasp of the over-all farm and food problems confronting the Nation. My second cut showed up 40 or 50 captive Congressmen—fellows whose thinking is entirely dominated by the problems of the districts or States they represent.

The balance—I'll call them confused Congressmen—includes a great majority of the Members of both Houses. Mostly these are men of fine ability and the best of intentions. But they are completely mystified by the numberless and contradictory demands of farmers and consumers.

Nor is this vast unhappy majority being helped out much by the national farm organizations. They, too, are split, both among and within themselves. Only by Herculean efforts are the heads of these organizations able to hold a working majority of their members in anything resembling a line.

With conditions as chaotic as this, there is an obvious need for spelling out a few fundamentals for a national farm and food program which will be in the interests of everyone. Country Gentleman has recognized this need by publishing a statement by Secretary of Agriculture Charles Brannan in its January issue, and in the March editorial, Price Supports Don't Make a Farm Program. Now I have my opportunity.

I shall begin by laying down the commonsense premise that a population soon to number 150,000,000 human stomachs can't take chances on tomorrow's meals. I suggest that we accept this principle as a basic test of all future farm and food legislation.

I'll even go a step further. Does the proposed program hold out hope of more Americans eating better? If it doesn't, it's not in the national interest and should not be written into law. I repeat that 150,000,000 people can't take chances on tomorrow's meals.

Surely no one can quarrel with this start. But there is a lot of farm and food legislation due to come before the Eighty-first Congress which will not square with this ideal. Some of it will be proposed by the captive Congressmen backed by powerful commodity and regional farm lobbies. Some of it will be put forward by individuals at the moment more interested in socializing agriculture than in our future food supply. These individuals would like nothing better than to cross 6,000,000 farmers off the list as private business managers. If they cannot do this any other way, they are prepared to buy them off with public funds.

It is going to take statesmanship, clear thinking, and stout courage on the part of the administration and Congress to stand up against these drives by the representatives of special interests and the subtle foes of private enterprise.

If we can agree on better meals for more Americans as a national long-time goal, it is only common sense to describe such meals in terms everybody can understand in order to secure maximum public acceptance of the goal. In previous articles in Country Gentleman I have done this.

The foods for such meals (when they are available at reasonable prices) are found in any well-stocked home refrigerator on any Saturday night, anywhere in the United States. They are the milk, meat, eggs, butter and cheese, and fresh fruits and vegetables with which most American housewives like to prepare the meals they serve. Any American family which eats free choice from a well-stocked home refrigerator certainly should be well nourished, happy, and content.

A second premise is that a nation with a growing population and the task of selling its philosophy of free enterprise to the rest of the world cannot afford to eat at the expense of its soil. Mere soil conservation is not enough for America. We must actually increase the productivity of our land. If we don't do this, there is no chance over the long pull of maintaining even our present dietary standards, much less of improving them. Fortunately, thousands upon thousands of farmers know how to do this job and are doing it.

Summarizing, I offer two guiding principles for everybody's farm and food program:

1. It must provide an ever-increasing American population with an ample supply of the foods we like best and which are best for us—the refrigerator foods.

2. These foods must be produced by the kind of farming which will build up soil productivity as well as conserve it.

As a security measure (I will discuss this later) we also must so farm and eat that we maintain at all times a substantial food reserve against war or natural disaster.

Only by the wise management of our food-producing livestock can we develop such a program. Under our system of farming, even soil fertility depends to a great degree on our animal population.

The ratio between our domestic livestock and our humans is one of the most important figures in our so-called way of life. How much food-producing livestock should there be behind the family refrigerator?

In an endeavor to get at some answer to this question I appealed to the chief of the USDA's Bureau of Agricultural Economics. As I expected, his staff already had a figure in which all food-producing livestock (including milk cows and laying hens but excluding horses and mules) was annually reduced to a hog-equivalent. I asked the Bureau to compare this figure on an annual basis with our population figures. My object was to see if it would be possible to keep track of the balance between our food-producing livestock and our human population. While this may come to be known popularly as a hog-man ratio, it must never be forgotten that the hog-equivalent figure includes the all-important dairy cow and laying hen as well as meat animals.

The Bureau came up with some most interesting comparisons. In 1919–20 we had 1.67 head of productive livestock to one human being. In 1934–35 this hit a low of 1.27. At the present time the ratio is estimated to be 1.41 hog-equivalents to one man.

For myself, I need no more accurate measure of the progress being made in working out a satisfactory farm-and-food program for everybody than this ratio. As it inches upward, we shall have well-stocked family refrigerators, improving soil fertility, and the kind of food stock pile we need for national safety. If it goes the other way, we shall be headed for a poverty-standard of eating.

I am convinced that there is only one way for us to stock pile any substantial amount of food—on the hoof. No better storage bin has ever been devised than the flexible hide of a steer or a dairy heifer. It is storage which also can be eaten if necessary. As we expand the numbers and weight of our livestock, we achieve everything the ever-normal granary ever tried to accomplish, including support of grain prices.

Actually, no country's livestock population should be a stationary thing. Traditionally, it operates as a cushion between our human population and the land. When good crops are produced, the bulk of them (normally over four-fifths of our cereal production) is naturally taken up by an expanding livestock population. Then, in the event of war or other disaster, we have a reservoir of high-quality, nutritious food just when we need it most. Killing the livestock releases the cereals and other foods that animals were eating for direct human consumption as we need them.

Stock-piling grain in dead storage is quite another thing. To go into storage at all, more has to be paid for the grain than the owners of livestock are willing to buy it for. The natural adjustment that would be made by feeding it to livestock thus is stopped in its tracks and the surplus is frozen. This is a bad thing for everyone.

Once in storage, the grain overhangs the market and becomes a football for politicians and the pressure boys. It costs money to hold it in storage and keep it in condition. Even then, the grain tends to deteriorate in nutritive quality. Finally, the whole economy is denied the turnover of this wealth in improving its standards of living.

In the long-time farm-and-food program which I am suggesting, grain in dead storage is a stand-by factor. Experience has indicated the normal carry-overs of grain that we should expect to maintain. The prudent livestock man will naturally attempt to protect himself. Our stored grain, in addition, should be sufficient to protect and to encourage the livestock producer who operates in regions where weather brings wide fluctuations in crop yields and the threat of liquidation of his herds because of lack of feed.

What really counts in dealing with big crops and building useful stock piles of food is our produtive livestock population. Let farmers on their own move the present ratio of 1.41 hog-equivalents to one man up to, say, 1.75 to 1, and we shall have improving soil fertility and a better supply of foods for the home refrigerator. The alternative is simple: an ever-increasing amount of grain in dead storage, acreage controls, progressive regimentation of 6,000,000 farmers, and finally no market for—refrigerators.

Now for some positive ideas for producing better meals for more Americans. The first step in implementing such a program is to manage our food-producing livestock to the maximum advantage of the human population. This is a job we have never tackled squarely.

We have been dealing with it in sections. We have veterinary schools for the health protection of animals. We have divisions in our experiment stations studying animal genetics. We have others dealing with the growing of forage for livestock, and still others with barn and feed-lot nutrition. But nowhere in the United States do we have an institution which brings together and correlates all these programs for the preservation and improvement of our domestic food-producing animals.

A few such pace-setting institutions are badly needed. I seriously propose for the consideration of some of the leading land-grant universities the establishment of schools or institutes of animal agriculture, the purpose of these institutions being to deal with our food-producing livestock population as a whole and to bring together for the teaching of graduate students who are destined to become skilled in the management of livestock all we know about the preservation and management of this basically important part of our way of life.

I am reliably informed that at least one leading land-grant university is considering setting up just such a school.

As a second positive step I feel that the great mass of publicly supported agricultural research should be inventoried and reviewed. This review should be by a committee representing all the people. Perhaps the National Research Advisory Committee might do this job.

Primarily, such review should seek to determine whether or not the public dollar appropriated for research in agriculture and food is being spent in the right proportions. Is enough aimed at the problems of our animal agriculture; or is too much of it devoted to fringe production, to specialty crops and the like?

Such a review should extend clear down to the State experiment stations. If it turns out as I expect it may, that we need to spend more research money to learn how to control animal diseases, breed them better, feed them cheaper and make better utilization of the food they produce, then this money should be made available. Or better still, it should be saved from projects which are not as fundamentally important.

As a third step, in putting a long-time farm-and-food program into effect we must cancel out, gradually but thoroughly, all those activities of Government which work against an expanding livestock industry with all the benefits it can bring to our standard of living.

It is at this point that our present conception of price supports must be brought into focus. It is at this point, too, that our ways of supporting soil conservation and soil building must come under critical study.

The above are complicated activities. Some of them are sired by socialism. Others are the children of pressure groups. All these devices must be kept under continuing review and constantly challenged to see if they are in accord with a long-time program of soil building, an expending livestock population, and better meals for more Americans.

For these are the three objectives toward which our economy must move. Actually, I think the question of whether our agriculture shall remain in the hands of free farmers or be State-managed, important as it is, is secondary to the question of how well we want to eat in the future. Which system will fill the most home refrigerators? That is what we all want to know, because we all have stomachs.

Realistically, this is the question now before the Eighty-first Congress. But in my opinion neither the Administration nor Congress but the market place eventually will answer this question.

If 150,000,000 Americans become sufficiently sold on the importance of the kind of meals they like best and is best for them, they won't kick in the long run on paying 6,000,000 farmers well to grow these meals. But this supposes two developments: (1) that through mass education and mass selling the American people will buy the ideal of good nutrition, and (2) that 6,000,000 farmers will be left free enough to apply their courage, their ingenuity, and their proved ability to produce cheaply adequate quantities of the foods for such nutrition—the refrigerator foods.

If we can gradually straighten ourselves out to a point where everybody appreciates the health, energy and social satisfaction of good eating; and farmers—principally through keeping more livestock—can get set to provide what the market really wants, we shall be on our way.

Consumers can be sold on the idea of paying fair prices for the foods they like best and which are best for them. Dairymen, poultrymen and livestock feeders under such circumstances will be willing to pay fair prices for grain. Remember that right now they provide four-fifths of the grain market. And, finally, the whole Nation will be safer because it is preserving its soil fertility and maintaining as it goes along a food reserve, the best which possibly can be devised, against war or natural disaster.

While actually the kind of farm and food program I have sketched should be self-sustaining because of the great flexibility which is inherent in our food-producing livestock population, let us suppose that we run into such a depression that too many of our 150,000,000 can't buy an adequate diet.

If this happens, then it seems to me that through school lunches and other diet subsidies which may be devised we can deal much more effectively with the emergency than we can if we try to meet it by shutting off production of food by acreage controls with resultant restriction of livestock numbers and, finally, State management of farming.

It must never be forgotten that over the long pull it is the suction of the market place on the food supply which determines the pay farmers get for raising food.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin has expired.

Mr. WHITE of California. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. WHITE of California. On page 2, in line 8, after the word "cotton", strike out the colon, insert a period in lieu therof, and strike out the balance of line 8 and all of lines 9, 10, 11 and 12.

Mr. POAGE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WHITE of California. I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. POAGE. Before he discusses his amendment I would like the gentleman to discuss a misstatement that was made a minute ago of the burden this program might impose on the taxpayers. Nobody wants to give a misunderstanding to the House. I understand how easy it is to make miscalculations when you are trying to do it in a hurry. I do think that we should make it perfectly plain that you cannot spend a billion dollars buying the product of even 2,000,000 acres of cotton and this does not add 2,000,000 acres of cotton anyhow.

Mr. WHITE of California. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California?

Mr. BECKWORTH. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, and I shall not object, I want to ask the gentleman in charge of the bill, the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. COOLEY], if it is his inclination to cut off debate or will the rest of us who have amendments have time to discuss our amendments?

Mr. COOLEY. Certainly I have no desire or intention to unduly restrict debate. The gentleman will have an opportunity to introduce his amendment and to speak on it. We should realize that there are some limitations to our time. I am not going to object to any further extension at this time, but if they become too numerous I may have to.

Mr. BECKWORTH. The reason I ask that question is that I undertook to offer some amendments in August, and I remember very distinctly that I was not privileged to explain some of the amendments which I had. Certainly I trust, within reasonable limitations, I shall have that opportunity today.

Mr. COOLEY. Within reasonable limitations I am sure the gentleman will have the opportunity.

Mr. BECKWORTH. I hope so.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California?

There was no objection.

Mr. POAGE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WHITE of California. I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. POAGE. As I understand under the most generous figures that the Department could suggest, that this bill would result in the planting of more than 1,400,000 acres; that was the testimony before us; was it not?

Mr. WHITE of California. That is correct.

Mr. POAGE. And of that sum 400,000 acres came in under the 50-percent gadget, leaving approximately 1,000,000 acres otherwise; that is right, is it not?

Mr. WHITE of California. That is right.

Mr. POAGE. And the actual average production in the United States is approximately half a bale per acre; is it not?

Mr. WHITE of California. That is right again.

Mr. POAGE. And if you take half a bale per acre on 1,000,000 acres, that would be half a million bales.

Mr. WHITE of California. That is right.

Mr. POAGE. The support price on cotton is a little less than 30 cents; is it not?

Mr. WHITE of California. That is right.

Mr. POAGE. With a 30-cent support price, you get only $150 a bale; do you not?

Mr. WHITE of California. That is right.

Mr. POAGE. At $150 a bale on half a million bales of cotton it could not amount to but $75,000,000, could it?

Mr. WHITE of California. That is correct. And, I make the further point, if the gentleman will allow me, that even if the money is loaned by the Government, it is not necessarily lost. The cotton program stands at a $200,000,000 profit as of this date.

Mr. POAGE. Exactly. If they spend $150 a bale on each bale that could possibly be produced, certainly the Government is not going to lose $150 a bale as the gentleman so well pointed out, and for the past 10 years it has not lost a single dollar per bale.

Mr. WHITE of California. That is correct.

Mr. POAGE. There is no possibility that they could lose $150, and even if they did, it could only be $75,000,000. And, even with all of that, is it not further true that the bill as it now stands, the law as passed last year, provides a minimum of 21,000,000 acres of cotton which can be planted?

Mr. WHITE of California. That is correct.

Mr. POAGE. And is it not further true that the Department of Agriculture estimates that even with this bill, with all of the gadgets in it now, that we still will not plant the 21,000,000 acres this coming year and instead of actually increasing anything, it will still wind up with less acreage planted than the present law authorizes for planting?

Mr. WHITE of California. That is right.

In explanation of my amendment, Mr. Chairman, I want to say this, that the 40 percent crop-land provision in this bill, which my amendment would strike out, was not in the original Cooley resolution when the subcommittee on cotton met here in December and the farmers voted without this limitation in there, and I submit that it is not fair, it is not right, it is not equitable that this should be now crammed down their throats. It certainly is a limitation placed upon the acreage that was promised to those farmers when they voted 90 percent in favor of this program.

Mr. COOLEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WHITE of California. I yield to the gentleman from North Carolina.

Mr. COOLEY. The gentleman is, of course, correct, and the gentleman also realizes that we liberalized the 70-percent provision by making it applicable to acres of cotton regarded as planted under Public Law 12.

Mr. WHITE of California. That is true, but that would not help the man who had been planting all of his land in cotton. The little fellow who has 40 acres all planted in cotton would, under the limitation you have put in the bill, be cut to 16 acres. I fought it in the committee and I have fought it here. It is not right, and my amendment would remove that injustice.

Mr. COOLEY. The gentleman has been fighting constantly. I will say to the gentleman that I am not wedded to the idea, but it was placed in the bill and it is now in the bill. I am sure there are Members in the House who will agree with the gentleman and I am likewise certain there are other Members here who will take the opposite view.

Mr. WHITE of California. I agree with the gentleman, there will be plenty on both sides.

Mr. ALBERT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WHITE of California. I yield to the gentleman from Oklahoma.

Mr. ALBERT. This 1,400,000 acres contemplates the bill if the gentleman's amendment is adopted, because we had no estimate after the 40 percent was put in.

Mr. WHITE of California. That is correct. I should like to point out that the Department of Agriculture's letter in regard to this legislation is highly critical of the cropland approach which this 40-percent provision reinstates. The bill as originally conceived in the House Subcommittee on Agriculture in December was based on the historical basis, in order to give relief to these people who had been hurt by putting it on the county factor basis, which is the cropland approach, and which caused all this trouble. Now they have come in here and stuck this 40-percent provision in which reverts back to the very cropland procedure which I tried so hard to get away from, and which the Department of Agriculture opposes.

Mr. ABERNETHY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WHITE of California. I yield to the gentleman from Mississippi.

Mr. ABERNETHY. If I understand the observation made by the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. ALBERT], the estimate that this bill would add 1,400,000 acres to the plantings of 1950 was made without the 40-percent limitation.

Mr. WHITE of California. That is right.

Mr. ABERNETHY. Can the gentleman tell us what the estimate will be with the 40-percent limitation in it?

Mr. WHITE of California. I am sorry I cannot. I have tried in vain to get those figures, and I have not been able to get them. However, it naturally should be less. That is a point that has been made.

Mr. COOLEY. If the gentleman will yield further, is it not a further fact that the original resolution was amended to take into consideration irrigated land which was not actually planted to cotton but that was planted to other crops at any time during the crop year? I thought the Department of Agriculture had cleared that up for the gentleman to his satisfaction.

Mr. WHITE of California. That is not my complaint at all, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. COOLEY. I know it is not, but that was the gentleman's complaint until it was satisfied.

Mr. WHITE of California. That was one of my complaints.

Mr. COOLEY. In other words, the gentleman will admit we have satisfied one of his complaints?

Mr. WHITE of California. One of my complaints has been satisfied, and I thank our distinguished chairman for that, but this is the same proposition the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CAMP] was talking about here a while ago. He knows the situation. He knows that the little farmer is being discriminated against. Certainly, this is only temporary legislation. The relief that is asked for here is asked for on a historical basis. So why put back in here a provision which throws it onto the cropland basis, and which caused all the trouble in the first place? If we are going to have a cropland basis, let us have it in the permanent legislation, not in this temporary legislation.

I should like to ask the gentleman from California [Mr. WERDEL], my distinguished colleague from the minority side, if it is not his understanding that the farmers in California are in favor of the removal of this 40-percent limitation.

Mr. WERDEL. As far as I have heard, that is correct.

Mr. WHITE of California. I am glad to hear the gentleman say that.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WHITE of California. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. KEATING. Can the gentleman tell us how much more it will add to the cost of this measure, to come out of the taxpayers of this country, if this provision is eliminated from the bill? What is the difference in dollars and cents?

Mr. WHITE of California. I am sorry I do not have the exact figures, but it is not a considerable sum when compared to the total relief that would be afforded under the 70-percent and 50-percent provisions.

Mr. KEATING. The gentleman does concede that to eliminate this provision would make this bill cost something more than it would with the provision in it?

Mr. WHITE of California. Undoubtedly it would, but I call the gentleman's attention again to the fact that this provision was not in there when the farmers voted, and it is a fraud by the United States Government to have them vote with that assumption and then turn around and pass legislation which knifes them.

Mr. KEATING. Does not the gentleman feel that we should have the exact facts about the cost of this measure before us before we are asked to involve our Government in the sums of money contemplated by such a measure, or by his amendment?

Mr. WHITE of California. I will give the gentleman this much definite information: It certainly would not exceed $25,000,000.

Mr. KEATING. That is a great deal of money out in my section of the country.

Mr. WHITE of California. It certainly is, but it was committed to the farmers when they voted on the acreage-quota referendum.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from California has expired.

Mr. BECKWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word and ask unanimous consent to proceed for five additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

Mr. BECKWORTH. Mr. Chairman, in the first place, I wish to say I shall support the resolution because a little acreage for some exceedingly poor farmers who need it in my section will do some good. But I shall not try to convey the idea to my people back home and to the people of Texas that this will help in a measurable way the ones who probably were hurt the most as a result of this legislation. I have some PMA letters from counties which I received, in which I asked them how a 70-percent amendment and a 50-percent amendment, as originally proposed, would help in their respective sections. I want to read the answers to some of those inquiries. One of them comes from the county of Shelby, which is not in my district. It says:

The county set aside 1,045 acres as a reserve for new grower cotton allotments. We have in Shelby County 2,242 farms which come under this above classification. It is estimated that 50 percent of these farms will apply for a new grower allotment, and, mind you, not by any means are those all new growers. They are simply people who did not grow cotton in the base years 1946, 1947, and 1948. Many of these are veterans who have returned home.

Now, what have you according to the situation today? A thousand acres to distribute among 1,100 applicants. The important thing is how many additional acres will this resolution give that county. At the most, it will give them, according to information sent me January 6, 1950, by Mr. Vance, our State committee PMA chairman, 995 acres—995 acres added to a thousand will mean that the county of Shelby, which is not in my district, will have about 2,000 acres to distribute to about 1,000 or 1,100 farmers—amounting to 2 acres apiece of not very fertile land. If you think that is a square deal, you have a right to your own conclusion.

Here we have another county, Harrison County. Their communication is dated January 3. The PMA office wrote me and said:

Under the 1950 allotment formula up to 300 and 400 farmers will be forced to cease farming, as their acreage is too small to obtain credit. Under the 70-percent provision they will get 749 acres. They will get 768 acres under the 50 percent. At the most, 1,214 acres. One thousand two hundred and fourteen acres of poor land will not go very far toward taking care of 300 or 400 families.

I talked to the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. TACKETT] a moment ago. I have a letter from his county committee in Pike County, which is in the State of Arkansas. They say:

Under the 1950 allotment program 200 farmers stand a good chance to be driven off their farms.

I asked him how much they will get under this, and according to his information, they will get some 50 additional acres.

I have a letter from Smith County, Miss. Incidentally, I am going to put all these letters in the RECORD. Some already are in the RECORD. They say that 200 farmers stand a good chance to be driven from the farm. How much additional acreage does Smith County get? According to some figures which the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. COLMER] obtained, they get 369 acres under the 75-percent provision, 124 acres under the 50-percent provision, and at the most 392 acres.

We have other counties. We have one down here which is not in my district—Trinity County. Here is what they say in their letter:

We have 175 acres of cotton to be distributed to new grower cotton farms. To date there have been at least 320 applicants for this acreage. The applications for the acreage are from farmers who shifted during the war to other crops and GI's returning from the war.

That is, they have under the present situation 175 acres to distribute to 320 farmers.

How much do they get under this new amendment? They get 103 acres under the 70 percent; they get 321 acres under the 50 percent; and, at most, 340 acres.

I have a note here from Forsyth, Ga. I asked them for a comment on the 70-percent and 50-percent provisions. "What good will this amendment do your county?" The letter that comes to me from Forsyth, Ga., says this:

The amendment attached, if approved, would be of no benefit to this county.

I do not know whether they are right or wrong, but that is what they say.

Let us see what we find from Rusk County, in Texas, with reference to the 70-percent and the 50-percent provisions. These figures are very pertinent. Here is what they say:

If Resolution 384 goes through as now written, it will be very damaging to the farmers of Rusk County. A 20 percent sample of the 2,550 farms receiving allotment was tabulated with the following results—

This was written January 10—

1,347½ acres would be the increase, of which 160 farms would receive less than 1 acre and 295 farms would receive the balance. This would leave 2,095 farms receiving less than their original 1950 allotment.

I read that letter to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. JONES], and he thought it was wrong. I sent it to our State committee chairman. He said as far as he could see it was correct. I hope it is not correct, but I fear it is correct. I repeat, I trust it is not correct.

I have a letter from Sabine County. What does it say? The letter was written January 3:

What this county needs is additional acreage for established allotments of new farm operators who have been released from wartime jobs and have no other ready means of livelihood. We have 115.3 acres and approximately 250 farmers have requested this acreage.

What does this amendment do? It gives them 196 acres under the 70 percent; it gives them 157 acres under the 50 percent; and, at most, 240 acres.

I have a letter from Natchitoches Parish, La. The letter was dated January 4:

There may be about 300 farm families in Natchitoches Parish displaced because of reduction of acreage.

This bill, according to figures I have put in the RECORD, gives them 320 additional acres under the plan which gives them most.

We have a county that Mr. REGAN, my colleague, represents. As I understand, it was drastically cut. If the figures that Mr. Vance gave me are correct with reference to that county, under the 70-percent provision, it will get 396 more acres; under the 50-percent provision, 1,211 more acres; and, at most, up to 1,343 acres.

I have another friend down in another section of Texas. He is what you call a big farmer. The county is Willesy. Under the 70 percent, that county gets 1,906 more acres. Four hundred and thirty acres under the 50-percent provision, and 1,949 acres at the most.

Mr. COOLEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BECKWORTH. I shall yield in just a moment.

Here is what I want to say to those here today. I submit that although an attempt has been made to be helpful, we are falling far short in helping the group of people who need help most. Do not tell me that these people, many of them, are not genuine cotton farmers. They are people who may not have been there in 1946, 1947, and 1948, but many of them, with the exception of the time which they spent in the war, and with the exception of the time they spent at war plants, and perhaps 2 years after the war closed, have farmed all of their lives. Do you think that is a good thing? Do you think it is justified or that it is a good type of economy to deny genuine cotton farmers the right to have a crop? That, in my opinion, is what is occurring under the provisions of the legislation originally passed in August 1949, and it will not be cured to any great extent in many cases by that which we are passing today.

Mr. Chairman, under most of the letters herewith I am placing the number of additional acres which would be required for the respective counties. I refer to the (1) 70-percent plan, (2) the 50-percent plan, (3) higher than 50 percent. I believe my figures are reasonably accurate and indicate in the main how many additional acres the counties would get.

HON. LINDLEY BECKWORTH,
Congressman of Third District of Texas, House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN BECKWORTH: In reply to your letter of January 3, 1950, in which you quote a portion of Mr. B. F. Vance's letter in regard to a reserve set aside by the county committee for adjustment purposes, I wish to advise:

In answer to the first question as to how many acres the county committee reserved for old farms which have not been growing cotton recently, and the second question, "How many new farms", we wish to say that new farms and old cotton farms, as well, are put under one classification as "new grower" farms. These farms are eligible to apply for a "new grower" cotton allotment. The county committee set aside 1,041 acres as a reserve for "new grower" cotton allotments.

We have in Shelby County 2,242 farms which come under the above classification. It is estimated that approximately 50 percent of these farms will apply for a new grower allotment.

We hope that this information will clarify these questions for you.

Very truly yours,

Hon. LINDLEY BECKWORTH,
Member of Congress, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. BECKWORTH: I would like to reply to your letter of December 23, 1949, on cotton allotments with answers to each question in sequence.

The 1942 Harrison County allotment was 75,000 acres. We believe if we could distribute the unused 1950 allotment we would have 1,500 to 2,000 acres to distribute.

If we can allot unused acres not many genuine cotton farmers would have to abandon farming although some larger farms might drop some tenants before their allotments are corrected.

War crop credits in this county amounted to approximately 2,000 acres.

Under the 1950 allotment formula up to 300 and 400 farmers will be forced to cease farming as their acreage is too small to obtain credit.

The Negro farmers with large families on farms with 20 to 50 acres of cropland are the hardest hit by this method of calculating allotments.

Yours very truly,

WALCOTT S. BLACK,
Administrative Officer,

SIR: In answer to your questionnaire of December 23, 1949, the following information can be furnished:

The official cotton allotment for Sabine County was 2,920 acres.

Final allotment was 3,272.7 acres.

If we could distribute the unused 1950 allotment in this county we would gain approximately 100 acres. Very little of this would come from genuine cotton farmers who could not continue to farm because of small allotments, but from small farms being taken out of cultivation.

The type of war-crop credits being talked about would probably help this county very little.

Probably 12 families may be compelled to cease cotton farming because of allotments. Most of these will be tenants.

What this county needs is additional acreage for establishing allotments on new farms having operators who have been released from wartime jobs and having no other ready means of livelihood. We have only 115.3 acres for the purpose, and approximately 200 farmers have requested this acreage on that many farms.

There are also many GI's who were not operators of farms when called into service because they were still unmarried boys with no family responsibilities.

These boys were able to purchase farms in 1948 and 1949 and are now able to cultivate them.

Because of acreage history they can get no cotton, except new allotments. Can they be helped?

Thanks for your interest.

DEAR MR. BECKWORTH: This is in reply to your letters of December 23, 29, and 30, 1949, requesting information on the 1950 cotton allotment situation in Rusk County.

There was set up in this county a reserve of 1,349.7 acres to distribute to new growers. We now estimate that between 900 and 1,000 farmers will request this acreage. The demand for farms with any kind of cotton allotment is enormous.

We estimate that there will be approximately 200 farms with 2 or more tenants and only enough cotton allotment for 100 of them. Also, there probably will be over 100 farms with 1 tenant who will be forced to cease farming under the present 1950 allotment formula.

Texas probably has enough acres if it could be redistributed more equitably between counties and also within the county.

Trusting this information will be of use to you and with best wishes, we are,

Respectfully yours,

E. D. MANSINGER,

DEAR MR. BECKWORTH: In reply to your letter of a few days ago, in which you requested information relative to the cotton allotment situation in Smith County, the following is submitted.

1. 1942 Smith County cotton allotment: 58,000 acres.

2. Number of acres we would have to redistribute, if the unused 1950 allotment could be used. It is estimated that about 1,000 acres would be released by farmers for redistribution.

3. Number of acres that would come from genuine cotton farmers who cannot continue to farm because of too little acreage. It is doubtful if any acres would be released by such farmers, as they would merely reduce the number of tenants on the farm, so that a reasonable crop could be had by each tenant.

4. War crop credit: Smith County would receive about 3,000 additional acres if this credit were granted.

5. Number of genuine cotton farmers that will be forced to quit farming in Smith County due to the 1950 cotton allotment formula (including tenants). It is estimated that at least 500 will be forced off of farms due to insufficient cotton acreage.

Hoping this to be the desired information, and should additional information be needed don't fail to call on us.

Hon. LINDLEY BECKWORTH,

DEAR MR. BECKWORTH: This will acknowledge your letter of December 19, 1949, requesting certain data relative to cotton allotments in Panola County, Tex.

In comparing 1950 with 1942 allotments we note that Panola had an allotment of approximately 52,700 acres in 1942 and 17,367 for 1950. These figures include the allotment for new growers also.

You ask about release and reapportionment of unused cotton acreage allotment. We expect very few acres from this source. We estimate 150 for the county. Farmers anticipate changes in procedures and fear that the surrender of cotton allotment may affect any future allotment that would be established on the farm.

We are in bad shape on new grower farms (those who did not grow cotton in any of the years 1946, 1947, or 1948); 1,300 such farms, and only 1,000 acres to distribute. Of this 1,300, at least 400 will apply for a portion of this acreage.

I hesitate to estimate the number of tenants that will be without homes as a result of the small allotments in this county. The big move will start in the spring and after Congress has considered giving some relief. They still have hopes that something better will come their way. No doubt the gentleman from Wills Point, Tex., was about right in his estimates. For example, in Panola County, in 1942, 0.3145 percent of the cropland was allowed for cotton while in 1950 only 0.1398 percent is allowed.

We appreciate your interest and will gladly furnish any additional information upon request.

DEAR SIR: In answer to your inquiry dated January 16, 1950, the following is submitted:

1. The county committee reserved the full percent it could reserve.

2. The committee reserved 15 percent of the total county allocation.

3. The amendment attached, if approved, would be of no benefit to this county.

4. If this county had 50 acres, with no strings attached, we could satisfy every cotton farmer in the county.

For the Monroe County committee:

I was reading Sunday the remarks of Representative EVINS, of Tennessee. He referred to some of his counties. As I understand, Franklin County, Tenn., would set 379 acres, 70 percent; 429 acres, 50 percent; 464 acres, higher; and Lincoln County, Tenn., would get 8.5 acres, 70 percent; 919 acres, 50 percent; 919 acres, higher.

Mr. Chairman, please note some information from other States:

Natchitoches, La., January 4, 1950.

Hon. LINDLEY BECKWORTH,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. BECKWORTH: In reply to your letter of December 24, this is to advise that the 1942 cotton-acreage allotment for Natchitoches Parish, La., was 50,233.7 acres.

If we could distribute the unused 1950 allotments to other farms within the parish, I believe that we could pick up between 2,500 to 3,000 acres. I do not think that any of this acreage will come from genuine cotton farmers who cannot continue to farm because of the reduced acreage.

I am not familiar with the type of war-crop credit that is being talked about; therefore I cannot answer this question.

There may be about 800 farm families in Natchitoches Parish displaced because of reduction of acreage.

As to the acreage to be distributed to old farms which have not grown cotton recently and to new farms which have recently come into production, we do not have any acreage in the parish for this purpose.

I understand that there are 35,000 acres set aside at the State level to take care of new-grower allotments.

We believe that if we can pick up unused acreage and distribute it to farms where additional cotton acreage is needed, many of our problems will be solved. Cotton-acreage allotments have been computed for quite a few farms where no cotton at all will be planted in 1950.

If you are in need of any additional information on this subject or any other phase of the PMA program at the parish level, please feel free to call upon me at any time.

Yours very truly,

H. L. SISSON,
Parish Administrative Officer.

Hon. LINDLEY BECKWORTH,

DEAR MR. BECKWORTH: Pike County is not a genuine cotton county as is no doubt the area which you represent. Few renters are in this county. Each owner cultivates his own small farm but the allotment for more than one-half of the farms is less than 5 acres.

The allotment for 1942 was 6,750 acres. The additional acreage with the distribution of the unused 1950 allotment could be well 500.

No genuine cotton farmer will pool his allotment but will cut his renters from 5 to 2 or 4 to 2.

The war-crop credit would not help this county very much.

There will be at least 200 farmers compelled to quit farming because of the 1950-allotment formula.

To old farms without allotment and "new farm," I have 50 acres. I have 200 requests for cotton allotments. This would mean at least 600 acres.

Thanking you for your interest and wishing you the best of success in your untiring efforts, I remain,

Mr. BECKWORTH: Reference is made to your letter dated December 24, 1949, in regard to some information you need concerning the cotton allotment. This information is as follows:

1. The allotment for Smith County in 1942: Approximately 23,000 acres.

2. Additional unused 1950 allotment that could be distributed: 700 acres.

3. Of this unused acreage, this amount will come from genuine cotton farmers who cannot continue to farm because of too little acreage: 200.

4. Number of war-crop credits which is being talked about which will mean more acres to Smith County: 100 acres.

5. Number of genuine cotton farmers in Smith County that might be compelled to cease to farm in Smith County under the 1950-allotment formula: 200.

6. Number of acres to be distributed to farms which have not grown cotton recently including new farms: 350.

HON. LINDLEY BECKWORTH: This is with reference to your letter of inquiry, date of December 12, 1949, on the cotton situation in Trinity County. We have 175 acres of cotton to be distributed to new grower cotton farms. To date there has been at least 320 applicants for his acreage. The applicants for the acreage are from farmers who shifted during the war to other crops, and GI's returning from the war. A few of the applicants, approximately six to eight, are people who have been working in defense industry, but have returned to the farm because they are too old and are being laid off from work, due to their age.

Several applicants are tenants from the farm having allotments so low the landlord will work the entire crop of cotton; example, tenant owning 80 acres of land, approximately 45 acres in cultivation, has worked peanuts (for market) and cotton on the adjoining farms for the years 1946, 1947, 1948, and feed crops on his own farm. Under the present law the tenant is a new grower and the landlord has a small allotment, which necessitates the tenant requesting new-grower allotment.

To clarify the situation in this county, we would like to point out that in 1942, 1,400 farms were growing cotton, compared to 516 allotment farms in 1950. You can imagine the number of requests this office will have for new grower allotments.

May I make a personal observation and state that we are 12 months behind on cotton. Everyone realizes there is a surplus of cotton, due to bumper crops in 1949, thereby necessitating a reduction in acreage. However, if we, or the farmers, have to accept a drastic reducton, the buying power of the farmer will be reduced so much that industry, labor, etc., will be affected to such an extent as to drive our country back to a depression.

In a recent meeting with the local merchants in our small town, everyone, without an exception, has already felt the effects of this program. The farmers are holding their money and doing without everything except the absolute necessities.

I wish that you, as well as Mr. PICKETT and the others, could be in our office and get the reaction of the farmers that visit this office. Then you would have a clearer picture of the whole situation. The farmers are not as critical as you would expect, but are disturbed.

It is hard for us to write the story as it actually is in our county, but hope this will help you in your fight for better farm programs. Please call upon us for any information you need and we shall work day and night to supply you with the information.

Very truly yours,

FRANK N. CATES,
Secretary, PMA, Trinity County.

DEAR MR. BECKWORTH: Henderson County reserved 1,450 acres of its official county allotment, all but 334 acres were used in adjusting 5- to 15-acre and other farms.

The chief concern of the committee is new-grower allotments as you see we only have 334 acres for this purpose, which will only be a drop in the bucket when distributed among 1,000 new growers.

We think you could relieve the situation in east Texas if you could get a price support on dry black-eyed and cream peas. Understand the State of California has one on black-eyed beans, which is the same as our peas.

The county committee concurs with Houston County in that the amendment will not help this county if we have to use the BAE acreage for the county. I am enclosing copy of a letter we sent Tom Pickett.

If we can be of further help, please advise.

Yours sincerely,

RAYMOND G. MAGERS,
Chairman, PMA Committee of Henderson County.

Hon. LINDLEY BECKWORTH,
United States Congressman, Third District, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. BECKWORTH: This will acknowledge your letter of January 6, 1950, relative to the cotton allotments in Rusk County. We also received a copy of House Joint Resolution 384.

The copy of Judge Selman's telegram attached to your letter states the situation in Rusk County the same as it applies to Houston County. If Resolution 384 goes through as now written, it will be very damaging to the farmers of Rusk County.

A 20-percent sample of the 2,550 farms receiving an allotment was tabulated with the following results:

One thousand three hundred and forty-seven and one-half acres would be the increase, of which 160 farms would receive less than 1 acre and 295 farms would receive the balance. This would leave 2,095 farms receiving less than their original 1950 allotment.

This penalty to the bulk of the cotton farms would be a direct result of an arbitrary adjustment of the planted history by the county committee in order to meet the figures of the BAE.

We have 2,105 other farms which do not have a planted history for 1946, 1947, or 1948 but many of them did grow cotton in 1949. There is a reserve of 1349.7 acres set up for new growers. We have over 100 applications for "new grower" allotments and more coming in every day. It is estimated there may be as many as 900 in all.

Respectfully yours,

B. A. DINWIDDIE,
Secretary, Rusk County PMA.

Mr. Chairman, according to some figures I have taken from records of the Department of Agriculture and from the 1949 Texas Almanac, a publication of the Dallas Morning News, some very interesting county cotton acreage comparisons exist in Texas. In 1942 the cotton acreage allotment of some 14 east Texas counties I refer to was 720,501; the 1950 cotton acreage allotment of the same 14 counties is 225,953 acres—less than one-third of the number of acres they had in 1942. The 1940 total population of the 14 counties was 494,004. They have more people now, I would estimate. The 1949 Texas Almanac shows the 14 east Texas counties to have some 43,127 farms.

I think it can be shown, on the other hand, there are counties in Texas individually having in them considerably less than 100,000 people and individually less than 2,500 farms that have more allotted cotton acreage than all the 14 counties with their over 40,000 farms and almost one-half million people—whereas the latter counties referred to individually had less than one-fourth of the cotton acreage then allotted the 14 counties in 1942.

At this point I desire to include a table which I feel is reasonably accurate based on the sources referred to:

Some cotton allotment comparisons

CARTHAGE, TEX., January 5, 1950.

Hon. LINDLEY BECKWORTH,
Member of Congress, Third District of Texas, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. BECKWORTH: This will answer your letter of December 23, 1949, regarding proposed legislation to relieve the deplorable situation that cotton growers in Panola County, Tex., find themselves. No doubt the same conditions exist in most of east Texas, parts of Arkansas, Oklahoma, Louisiana, Alabama, Georgia, and the northern part of Mississippi. In referring to these areas, I have in mind sections of the country where poorer land and smaller farms are located. They were populated with people, both colored and white, with limited education, small incomes, large families, and low credit ratings. Then the war came and age groups affected by selective service could not be deferred because of insufficient units on these small farms. For economical and patriotic reasons those rejected for military service went to nearby shipyards, defense plants, and other employment necessary to the war effort and even to large farms in other sections of the country where farming is carried out on a mass-production scale. Rising prices made it necessary that they earn more money than could be expected from a small farm.

After the war was over these farmers did not readily return to the farm for economical reasons. This resulted in little or no cotton history on many farms in Panola County during the base period—1946–48. In fact 1,300 of the 2,860 farms in this county have no cotton history. Many of these farm people that we refer to have returned to their farms now, because industries are catching up with orders and this labor is no longer needed. Since industry is not obligated to pay men they don't need, these people must be allowed the privilege of earning a living and farming is all they know. This county has only 1,000 acres of cotton allotment to give these nonhistory farms and if one-half of this 1,300 apply for an allotment, there will be less than 2 acres of cotton allowed for each farm. On these 1,560 history farms in Panola County, most of them will be allowed less than 14 percent of their cropland for a cotton allotment—the county factor is .1398. This situation makes many farmers unreasonable to talk to and you can hardly blame them. Their normal farm life was interrupted by the war and they became displaced persons for such period and it will take time, even a longer period of time, for their readjustment than most any other industry. By comparison, farmers were allowed over 31 percent of their cropland for a cotton allotment before the war.

You asked about the proposed 70–50 amendment for the sections of the country that we mention, but I doubt if very much relief can come from this amendment. In this country it was necessary to make severe downward adjustments in cotton acreages reported by the farmer, to come within BAE estimates. These adjustments had to be made on an individual farm basis and when the farmer complained he was told that such adjustment would not affect his cotton allotment because at least 1 of the 3 years 1946, 1947, or 1948 had been left reasonably high. We told him wrong if the 70–50 amendment is passed and many appeal cases will result.

You asked what provisions would be needed to give some relief. I will say an amendment as follows would give us much relief and not take too much additional cotton acreage: (1) Irrespective of the county factor, the cotton allotment on any history farm shall not be less than 75 percent of the highest acreage reported by the farmer to be planted to cotton in 1946, 1947, or 1948 but not to exceed 30 percent of the cropland on the farm. (2) Grant additional cotton acreage to the county committee for distribution to extreme hardship cases including nonhistory farms. (3) Allow unused cotton acreage to be returned to the county committee for redistribution to other farms.
